Hartford ends UMass' up–and–down season

Minutewomen unable to convert chances as Hawks eliminate UMass to advance in tourney

By Mike Reiss
Collegian Staff

It had all come to this.

Sixteen seconds remained on the clock at chilly Al-Marzook Field in West Hartford, Conn., and the UMass reserves, along with the coaching staff, rallied around each other in front of the Minutewomen bench.

At this point, the NCAA Northeast regional semifinal match was well out of reach, as Hartford was on its way to a 2–0 victory. As the seconds wound down so helplessly, the emotion on the UMass sideline was uncontrollable.

The team's topsy–turvy season had come to an end, as had the storied careers of senior co–captains Heidi Kocher and Melissa Mitchell.

"It feels good that we fought back from our early season 2–5 slump, but then once you get to the end of your season, it doesn't feel so good," said sophomore defender Erin Lynch. "We had a lot of pride to fight back to where we were."

Massachusetts	0

Indeed. In Saturday's match, there was more of that same fight and pride from the Minutewomen, but in the end, it wasn't meant to be, as Jessica Reifer's 18–yard direct kick at 89:44 sealed the matter for Hartford.

The teams played scoreless soccer for the first 79 minutes of the match, with both having a few scoring bids. At 79:04, Hartford cashed in on the only opportunity it would need when Donna Holyman volleyed a crossing pass from Erin Pochman into the back of the net.

"I don't think the players lost that game today," said UMass Coach Jim Rudy, instead shouldering the blame himself. "Tactically, we had made a little bit of a switch, pushing [Nicole] Roberts out to the right flank to get a good matchup out there. Although we didn't get the matchup, they changed and brought in a new player to match with Roberts.

"So, I thought if they were going to do that, then we'll push Roberts back to the frontline, and put [Melissa] Mitchell out there. We had created a bad matchup for ourselves. And within a minute, they ran the flank, served, and boom, a goal."

The score seemed inevitable for Hartford, who swarmed around the goal box for much of the second half. Many of the Hawks shots sailed either high or wide. When a shot did appear destined for the back of the net, Dion rose to the task. Despite having only three saves to her credit, all three were highlight film caliber stops.

The first two saves came in the first seven minutes of the match. At 5:30, Holyman sent an outward curving shot headed to the far left post that Dion managed to touch aside while sprawled out in the air. Just 1:20 later, Irene Stelling was in alone and Dion came sliding out to break up the play.

"That would have put us in a hole to begin with," Rudy said.

UMass had its fair share of opportunities as well. In the first half, Lynch, Amy Powell and Rebecca Myers had chances in the goal box. Rachel LeDuc was active offensively in the second half, with perhaps the best Minutewomen chance of the match at 19:15 with a high hard shot right at the keeper, Danielle Rotondi.

Overall, Hartford head coach Austin Daniels saw the battle of the midfield as being a key in the match. With UMass star midfielder Myers both hampered by a hamstring pull and blanketed by the Hawks defense, the Minutewomen offense sputtered for the most part.

"In the first half, Myers was getting them into the game more," Daniels said. "In the second half, I think we did a better job on her, and in turn, their forwards had the ball less."

So it all had come to this, the 1994 soccer season had come to an end. The team's rallying around each other at the end of the match spoke volumes about their actions throughout the season. They stuck together.

"They were about as down as you could get," said Rudy. "And they did very well to come back."

The Minutewomen finish the season with a 16–6 record.

1994 Season held several positives for Minutewomen

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

"I thought this was a very good season. We didn't play as well in the middle as we did in the beginning or the end but we had some circumstances that helped create that. But I just admire this team tremendously for coming back, and that was very hard to do because this team was just about down and out. I respect them incredibly for coming back."
- Massachusetts Coach Jim Rudy

The date was Oct. 22 and the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team was at the lowest point they could get. They had just lost to Connecticut 2–1 and hopes for the postseason were dampened. Many players thought it was all over. The team was 10–5, losers of five of its last eight games.

Before they had made the trip to UConn the two captains, Heidi Kocher and Melissa Mitchell, had held a players only meeting to discuss the problems that the team was having. It resulted in positive feeling among the players. They entered the UConn game loose and confident, excited and ready to play. But they left Storrs with the loss and a bad feeling.

Instead of giving up and just playing out the rest of the season, the Minutewomen dug deep within themselves and ran off six straight victories to climb back into the NCAA picture.

They beat a very tough George Washington team twice by 1–0 and 2–1 scores. The second win came in the Atlantic 10 Tournament Championship game, which they won for the second year in a row. They beat a good Cornell team 2–1, who had beaten Hartford 2–0, earlier in the year.

They received a NCAA wildcard bid and hosted Harvard at Richard F. Garber Field. They beat the Crimson 3–0 and advanced to the Regional semifinals against the University of Hartford.

Even with the 2–0 season ending loss to Hartford, positives can be taken from the season. They finished 16–6 and were A–10 Champions.

Little attention paid to matchup with Penguins

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

What could've been, should've been. But it wasn't.

The University of Massachusetts had a party at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium on Saturday afternoon, with a special guest appearance in the form of an opponent being made by the Youngstown State Penguins.

The same Youngstown State that won the NCAA Division I–AA Championship last season. The same Youngstown State that has been victorious in 13 of its 14 previous contests heading into this past weekend, with the other being a tie game. The same Youngstown State who is currently ranked No. 1 in the country.

The party did have potential. The Penguins were the first No. 1 team to go head–to–head against Massachusetts football squad since 1978 when the Minutemen defeated the Nevada–Reno Wolfpack [11–0 at the time] in the Div. I–AA semi–finals. It was the second time in history a Massachusetts football team had battled the No. 1 team.

The creme de la creme of the Div. I–AA world was coming to town. The maximum guest list consisted of 16,000 people. The party turned out to be a bust.

A stroll through the parking lot coming to the game saw a scarce amount of tailgaters, filling up about half of E–Lot. A glance out of the pressbox saw a large amount of aluminum, as the seats of the Massachusetts were barely 3/4 of the way full. There were empty seats in the press box for the first time all season. Why the disappointing turnout?

There were some reasons that could be considered for the discouraging turnout of 6,150.

• No playoffs — The Minutemen, now 5–5 overall and 4–4 in the Yankee Conference, took themselves out of the playoff picture on Oct. 29, losing to then No. 7 Boston University 28–24. That was loss number four for the Minutemen, a number that basically erases a team from playoff contention.

Had the game been more meaningful, with a possible trip to the Div. I–AA playoffs riding on the result, the game undoubtedly would have created a larger turnout.

• Long weekend — With Veterans Day on Friday, many of the students headed home for the long weekend. There were considerably less people on campus this past weekend than on a normal one.

• Youngstown who? Only the die–hard Massachusetts football fans are somewhat knowledgable of Div. I–AA ball. Even the accomplishments of an opponent like Youngstown State can go unnoticed, simply because the level of Div. I– AA is second–rate to the big time, not only talent–wise, but exposure–wise, as well.

• Questionable promotion to student body — The promotion was apparent on the season–ticket application form, with special attention given to the

Youngstown State gives UMass its fifth loss

No. 1 Penguins shut down Minuteman running game and take advantage of five UMass turnovers

By Anthony Guido

Youngstown State came into Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium on Saturday and showed why it is the team of the 1990s in Division I–AA football.

The Penguins defeated the University of Massachusetts 28– 9 before a crowd of 6,150. The defending national champion performed just as the No. 1 team in the nation should, capitalizing on five UMass turnovers.

"They are the class of I–AA, and they played like it," UMass Coach Mike Hodges said. "We had to play a great game to beat them, we knew that, but couldn't do it."

UMass (5–5) was unable to establish a running game, netting only 121 yards on the day. The Minutemen came in averaging 248 yards per game. Running back Rene Ingoglia (22 carries, 75 yards) had been averaging 149 yards per contest, good for third in the nation. Tailback Frank Alessio was also bottled up, gaining just 18 yards on 13 attempts.

Youngstown St.	28
Massachusetts	9

"We felt they were one of the finest running teams we will face. We designed and worked all week to stop their running game," YSU Coach Jim Tressel said. "Today, we stopped them and that's why we won."

Freshmen quarterback Anthony Catterton saw his first significant action of the season, playing most of the game for Andrew McNeilly, who was out with a stomach virus. Catterton completed 9 passes on 17 attempts for 99 yards.

"No freshman should have to have their first game against the number one team in the nation. He had a lot of courage and was very calm in clutch situations," Hodges said.

Brian Corcoran was a defensive standout all day for the Minutemen, leading the team with six tackles and two sacks. The senior defensive lineman now has 30 career sacks, only three away from UMass' all–time sack leader Mario Perry (1989–93).

"It is a special feeling knowing it's my next–to–last game, the intensity was up, the whole defense played pretty well today," Corcoran said.

YSU (9–0–1) asserted its dominance right from its first possession, marching down the field on a 12 play, 74 yard drive. Shawn Patton (15 carries, 105 yards) capped the drive with his first of two touchdowns, a five yard run. Quarterback Mark Brungard (10–16, 72 yards passing) for was perfect on three passes and ran for 14 yards in the drive.

UMass averaged but one first down on its first three positions, as YSU owned the football for over nine minutes in the first quarter.

"Their defense pursues the ball better than any I've seen, Youngstown St. is just so technically sound on the defensive side of the ball," Hodges said.

Early in the second quarter, while running an option play on third down, Catterton fumbled on his own 21. Two plays later it was 14–0 as Brungard (21 yards rushing) ran 14 yards on a bootleg, catching UMass off guard.

UMass took the momentum into the locker room at halftime, driving 87 yards on 15 plays with 5:45 to go in the half. Catterton completed 3 of 4 passes for 44 yards, while running for 33. Ingoglia plunged in from the one, cutting the lead in half.

"I had heard how good the number one team in the nation was, but at halftime I felt we were as good as them and could go out there and beat them," Catterton said.

"We were upbeat at halftime, but they are a good defense, and we just didn't execute today," Ingoglia said.

All that momentum was taken away on the third play from scrimmage in the second stanza. Patton exploded for a 68 yard touchdown run, cutting back up the middle, beating an overpursuing UMass defense.

"We had to make some big plays to beat this team, but we couldn't do that and they did," Hodges said.

The next few series for both teams had one recurring theme. UMass would fumble on consecutive possessions, YSU would recover only to have the Minutemen defense hold them in their own end. A Catterton fumble, an Alessio fumble, followed by a Catterton interception.

"We aren't that type of team. We can't turn the ball over like that," Hodges said. "The defense played well at times, we just didn't give ourselves a chance to win."

Youngstown St. finally broke through again after Lester Weaver's interception, giving the Penguins field position on the UMass 25. After a 14 yard Patton run, Brungard scored on a two yard keeper.

Corcoran provided the final points for UMass, dropping YSU's Demond Tidwell in the end zone for a safety.

"We made some mental mistakes, and when you do that against a team this good you're in trouble," Hodges said.

Asian nations pressure N. Korean freeze

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

JAKARTA, Indonesia — In an orchestrated show of unity, President Clinton won pledges Monday from China, Japan and South Korea to keep the pressure on North Korea to freeze its suspected nuclear weapons program.

Clinton, after one-on-one talks with presidents and prime ministers, said North Korea's neighbors offered "their strong support" for the accord to freeze and ultimately dismantle Pyongyang's nuclear program.

China, South Korea and Japan already had endorsed the North Korean agreement, but Clinton showcased the issue because many details of how to implement the pact over 10 years remain to be worked out.

Clinton said the plan — providing North Korea with alternate fuels and new light-water reactors for giving up its nuclear program — would "require a lot of efforts on several fronts." Perhaps the thorniest question is how to divide the estimated $4 billion cost of the deal. Japan and South Korea are expected to shoulder most of the burden.

After one-on-one talks and a ceremonial dinner opening the 18-nation Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum, Clinton met again Monday night with Japanese Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama and South Korean President Kim Young-Sam at their request to further discuss the nuclear accord.

Administration officials said the session was intended to help underscore the importance of the agreement to the United States in order to help Murayama and Kim sell the deal at home.

The Asian and Pacific leaders were expected to endorse Tuesday a blueprint for a free-trade pact that would tear down trade barriers across the Pacific Rim over the next quarter-century.

Clinton, on his second trip abroad in recent weeks, was closely questioned by his foreign counterparts on last week's GOP election sweep. Pledging cooperation with Republicans, Clinton said, "My strategy will be to have an open door and to have a lot of contact."

Still jet-lagged after back-to-back trips to the Middle East and Asia with nonstop campaigning in between, Clinton joked, "I think I'm still somewhere between Jordan and Jerusalem."

Clinton held a news conference in a lush garden at the U.S. ambassador's residence where his remarks mixed with the whistles of song birds.

He brushed aside objections from allies about halting American enforcement of the Bosnian arms embargo. Clinton portrayed his move as preferable to an outright revocation of the arms ban, insisting, "We are not violating the arms embargo."

Asia is the world's fastest growing economic region, and U.S. trade across the Pacific is three times as large as that with European nations.

U.S. officials predicted endorsement Tuesday of a statement calling for "open and free trade" throughout the region by the year 2020. Industrial companies would try to achieve the goal by 2010 while less-developed countries and newly developed nations would aim at the 2020 target.

The North Korean accord and trade took precedence over U.S. concerns about human rights problems in China. Human rights issues have receded since Clinton granted China most-favored-nation trade status last May without regard to its human rights conduct.

Defending his approach, Clinton said the United States, perhaps more than any other country, "consistently and regularly raises human rights issues."

He said he discussed the subject with Chinese President Jiang Zemin and raised specific issues.

"We made it absolutely clear," Clinton said, "that in order for the United States' relationship with China to fully flower, there had to be progress on all fronts."

Boston man to be charged in UM stabbing

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Amherst police issued an arrest warrant on a Boston man they will be charging for the stabbing of a University of Massachusetts student two weeks ago.

The police will not release the suspect's name, but officials are working with the Boston Police Department to serve the warrant, according to Lt. Jeffrey Roy of the Amherst Police Department.

Several anonymous leads over the telephone led to a warrant. Two Amherst detectives, Ron Young and Charles Nelson, received the tips on the suspect. Roy would not comment on how the anonymous tips lead to a suspect.

Daniel P. Boudreau, a pre-communication freshman, returned to classes last week after being hospitalized for stab wounds, police said.

Boudreau was stabbed several times during a fight that broke out on North Pleasant St. on Oct. 30.

The fight started when a group of hitchhikers yelled at the car which Boudreau was in. The vehicle then turned around and parked next to the group.

A fight ensued, and he was stabbed. Boudreau then went to Delta Upsilon fraternity house to call an ambulance.

"I knew I was bleeding, I just didn't know it was from a knife," Boudreau said.

He suffered from a collapsed lung, multiple-stab wounds in the side and back, and lacerations to the head.

"I have a lot of work to catch up on," Boudreau said. "But I'm doing the best I can."

Boudreau said he was not sure of the specifics of the charges, but he would like to see something come of them because of the severity of the injuries.

"If it was a couple of centimeters over, it could have been my heart," he said. "The charges should

State officials to review complex ballot questions

By Jonathan Yenkin
Associated Press

BOSTON — The secretary of state's office said Monday it would take another look at the format for ballot questions after last week's election prompted complaints of voter confusion.

Secretary of State Michael J. Connolly will review how other states handle complex ballot questions and present a report in the next few weeks, said Bob Moriarty, a spokesman for the office. "We're interested in correcting a situation which may have caused some confusion," Moriarty said.

Voters last week faced nine statewide ballot questions. But because some were so complex, such as one that would have rewritten the state's tax laws, Connolly's office was unable to print the entire summaries on the ballots.

Instead, it printed summaries to distribute to voters at the polls. The actual ballots only showed the numbers of the questions with no other titles or written descriptions.

The secretary of state's office noted the state constitution only makes provisions for printing detailed summaries to accompany the questions.

But state Rep. John McDonough, D-Boston, co-chairman of the Legislature's Committee on Election Laws, said he had assumed the secretary of state's office would have at least printed titles on the ballots "so people would not be voting blind."

McDonough, who called the omission of any description a "bonehead move," said the secretary of state's office had gotten permission from the Legislature earlier this year to print the summaries on separate sheets apart from the ballot.

He said the Legislature could have given permission to print titles with the questions, but no one ever asked.

"This was a serious mistake," he said.

A bill pending in the Legislature would place one-sentence summaries on the ballots.

Some activists who failed to win in last week's ballot questions are contemplating legal challenges. But McDonough said it would be tough to bring such a lawsuit because activists would have to identify enough people who were confused and would have voted differently to change the outcome.

"Whatever confusion there was, it was probably uniform" on both sides, he said.

U.N. official justifies strategies

Rizza speaks on peacekeeping with contradictory results

By Juan Jose Chacon Quiros
Collegian Staff

Iqbal Rizza, United Nations assistant secretary general for peacekeeping, walked into the red carpeted Converse Assembly room at Amherst College last night to talk about "U.N. peacekeeping in a turbulent world."

Rizza, who's been working for the United Nations since 1978, gave an overview of what peacekeeping means for the organization. By downplaying the importance of the secretary general and the general assembly of the United Nations and emphasizing the role of the security council, Rizza tried to justify the need for peacekeeping operations.

According to Rizza "consent of the parties" has to occur before a peacekeeping operation is implemented. However, he mentioned Korea and Congo as cases where this condition was not fulfilled.

After the end of the cold war, the number of peacekeeping of operations has sharply increased. In his view, in these cases force can be "used or misused."

"The Iraq-Kuwait conflict was authorized by the United Nations but carried out by the United States," Rizza said. "The United States would support United Nations peacekeeping only where the U.S. national interest is at stake."

JUAN JOSE CHACON QUIROS / COLLEGIAN

Rizza explained that in the case of Rwanda the French took the lead in the peacekeeping process, illustrating its fundamental weakness: "It depends on the will of the member states." He was later told by a person in the audience that the French actually sided with the faction accused of the death of 500,000 people.

In the case of Haiti, Rizza said that "it did not fit the criteria for international peace and security." According to him, the political interest of the United States lead to the operation in Haiti.

Rizza explained that is hard to achieve "impartial and effective" operations but there are indications that they have been "partially successful." However, when

SGA door knocking campaign targets needs of students

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

Students in the Hamlin Residential Hall at the University of Massachusetts will receive unexpected visitors tonight.

The Student Government Association (SGA) has begun a door knocking campaign to better meet student needs.

At 7 p.m., SGA president Mirran Raphaely and recruitment coordinator Charles Lenchner will meet in the Northeast Residential Area for preparations before they venture to Hamlin to speak with students.

"We are walking around talking to students about what SGA is doing this semester and how we can better help them," Raphaely said.

Raphaely and Lenchner have been visiting residential halls on campus since mid-October, encompassing all the living areas on campus including five dormitories. According to Raphaely, the response from students has been positive.

"The fact that we bother to go out to the students to talk to them, makes them happy, that we are making an effort," Raphaely said.

Lenchner stressed that the SGA is willing to listen to all the students problems and evaluate what they can do.

"Even if the person's problem seems insignificant to them, we will listen to them and try to help," Lenchner said.

SGA has been talking with students about their concerns about the University. According to Lenchner, students have voiced opinions about everything from tuition and fees to why there is nothing to do on campus during the weekend.

"We have been talking with students about accessibility to this University, affordability, food services and their personal problems," Raphaely said. "If students have a problem, we take their name down and make calls to try to help them."

"We are also trying to make sure that UMass is affordable," Lenchner said. "There are a lot of students who may be qualified to come here but can't afford it."

SGA is working to improve the quality of the University for the students. Last week the Undergraduate Student Senate passed a motion to reestablish the Course and Teacher Evaluation Guide (CATE), which has not been published for several years, according to Lenchner.

"Students want to be able to know how other students felt about a specific class or teacher, to help them choose what courses to take," Lenchner said. "The CATE also helps SGA identify problem areas which need to be worked on."

ROTC nursing major recognized with First Region award

Louise Correia demonstrates how to splint someone's leg to a group of cadettes.

By Jessica Taverna

Historically, nurses in the military have been revered as the "unsung heroes."

One ambitious nursing student has managed to sing her own sweet song to success and national recognition, breaking down stereotypes and paving the way for future nurses.

Louise Correia, of the University of Massachusetts ROTC division, has recently received the First Region Excellence in Nursing Award, according to Marc Cappellini, a head commander in the UMass ROTC division.

This award acknowledges Correia, a senior nursing major at UMass, as the most outstanding nurse cadet in ROTC's first region, which stretches down the east coast and goes as far west as the Mississippi River, Cappellini said.

In a memo sent from Fort Bragg, North Carolina to congratulate Correia, U.S. General Thomas J. Konitzer wrote that "it is great young American heroes like [Correia] that validate the high standards and professionalism for the Army Nurse Corps."

Correia, 21, is ranked number one in her class of 28 in UMass Army ROTC, and number two in her class of 40 in nursing at UMass, Guelle said. She is responsible for training cadettes in the field of nursing and a number of other duties.

"Louise is always willing to bend over backwards for other nurses and cadetes," UMass ROTC Captain Paul Guelle said. "She leads by example, and always has a smile on her face."

She was selected to be the Battalion Commander of the Minuteman Battalion next semester. Her battalion will consist of 100 cadets, 70 percent of whom are female, Correia said.

This kind of responsibility, added to a full class load could be a lot to handle, but Correia is anxious to embark on her new position.

"It's a challenge, but I enjoy it," Correia said. "The skills I acquire here are not pure army skills. I can take them with me after graduation, and advance as an army nurse."

She will be responsible for the organization of a cohesive staff with responsibilities for operations, training, recruiting, fund raising, budgeting activities and cadet administrative actions, Guelle said.

"It's a wonderful program," Correia said. "We have highly-moti-

Dear Diary,

Last night when I was up in my favorite tree stargazing I began to ponder my life. I realized that some of my favorite things were no longer part of the new pop culture, and that many of my best loved activities were out of style. I enjoyed Pac Man and now there is Mortal Combat II. My one Barbie was fine for all seasons, but now there is a Barbie for every month and special event. I used to think rollerskating around my neighborhood in my neon, shiny jacket with my name on the sleeve was fun, but now everybody has rollerblades and they can go much faster. I used to enjoy trips to the grocery store with my mom until she told me it was wrong to eat candy from the big bins. The more I sat and thought about how my interests were different than most others I remembered that I HAD read The Daily Collegian that morning, and I knew that it was the hip thing to do because everybody was reading it. Instead, The Daily Collegian saved me from an identity crisis! I climbed happily down from the tree.

Health services HIV testing offers anonymity

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Health Services offers a free, anonymous HIV testing site to educate students as well as test them.

Every Tuesday, the clinic performs free anonymous HIV testing from 9 a.m. until 3:45 p.m. To get the results of a test, two appointments — one to collect the sample and one to release the result, are required, according to Debra Edelman, health educator.

"I think [the program] is doing well because it is anonymous and it creates a safe environment to ask questions and still remain anonymous," Edelman said. "I would love to have another day to do testing."

The HIV testing program allows appointments only one month in advance since, according to Edelman, if appointments were made any later many people would forget them.

Because testing is done only one day, when making an appointment, students may have to wait anywhere from two weeks to a month to receive their results, said Edelman. She said the wait is not that remarkable.

"If you called up your dentist, you would probably have a three week wait," Edelman said.

According to Edelman, the program does have a problem with people who make appointments and then never show up for them. Since the program is anonymous, there is no way to contact those who miss their appointments.

The rate of people who do not show up for their testing appointments can fluctuate greatly. Last semester there was a month when the no show rate was 50 percent. The following month the rate dropped to 22 percent, said Edelman.

She said she asks those who may have to miss their appointments to call ahead, even if it is just a few hours ahead.

The UMass testing site is funded partially by state funds, which pays for the testing of the blood. All blood to be tested is sent to a state-run testing lab in Boston. The blood is not tested at the University.

The University pays for the counselors on duty who do the pre and post test counseling and take care of the educational aspects of the program. These counselors are trained by the state and paid by UMass.

"We do programming in residence halls; we lecture in classrooms," Edelman said. "This program goes beyond the Health Center."

Edelman said the program's education focuses on high risk behavior instead of high risk groups.

"It's high risk behavior such as unprotected sex or intravenous drug use that's the risk," said Edelman.

The program recommends people wait six months after any questionable activity before they get tested or the HIV antibodies, which the test looks for, may not be present, Edelman said.

There are other local anonymous HIV testing sites if students feel uncomfortable getting tested on campus. Students can call Family Planning in Northampton at 586-2016, or 1-800-750-2016 to receive more information on other free, anonymous HIV testing sites in Northampton, Holyoke and Springfield, according to Edelman.

Tropical Storm Gordon results in massive losses in Haiti

Thousands are left homeless as flooding damages capital

By Chris Torchia
Associated Press

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti — Heavy rains and flooding from Tropical Storm Gordon swept across Haiti on Monday, killing at least 100 people, triggering landslides and washing away makeshift homes in the slums of the capital.

Terrified people fled their homes in the early morning darkness as floodwaters poured in. Some spent the night huddled on their rooftops in the downpour.

By the time the skies cleared, thousands of people were left homeless.

"I didn't save anything, only myself," said Lekeas Dorvilier, 35, who jumped out the window of his two-room home minutes before it crumbled into a ravine.

Bodies lay in the sun in some neighborhoods. Many of the victims lived in flimsy tin shacks on hillsides. Rescue workers said they expected the death toll to climb.

President Jean-Bertrand Aristide flew over his battered nation in a U.S. military helicopter to survey damage from the 1994 Atlantic hurricane season's deadliest storm.

"Obviously we will do what we can to help the Haitian government," said Col. Barry Willey, a U.S. military spokesman. Thousands of U.S. soldiers arrived in the Caribbean nation in September to help restore Aristide's elected government. Aristide, who was ousted in a 1991 coup, returned Oct. 15.

Two deaths also were reported in Jamaica, where the storm caused widespread flooding and mudslides. At least two people were killed in Cuba and 65,000 were evacuated, Cuba's official Prensa Latina news agency reported.

The storm killed at least 40 people in Port-au-Prince, the Haitian Press Agency said. Radio Metropole said 40 people were killed in the southeastern port Jacmel, and dozens more were missing. And radio station Signal FM said 20 people were killed in Leogane, about 40 miles west of Port-au-Prince.

The main highway from Port-au-Prince to Jacmel was cut and trucks from the charity CARE, which feeds about 300,000 people, couldn't cross shaky bridges to reach its warehouse in Gonaives, north of the capital, aid officials said.

U.S. Army meteorologists said more than nine inches of rain fell in Port-au-Prince during the 24-hour period ending Monday morning and 14 inches fell in Les Cayes on the southern peninsula.

U.S. soldiers pulled a body from a flooded road late Sunday in the Port-au-Prince neighborhood of Martissant. The body, covered with flies, lay on the porch of a nearby home Monday morning, surrounded by curious onlookers.

U.S. officials question finances of Iraq

By Donald W. Swinton
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council refused Monday to lift economic sanctions on Iraq, and U.S. officials attacked Iraqi claims of hardship by showing pictures of new palaces built by Saddam Hussein.

One palace is three times the size of the White House, and other reports said Iraq is importing liquor, fur coats and ice cream. Diplomats said it was the first evidence they had seen of such levels of spending by Iraq's rulers.

The 15-nation council rejected Iraq's claim that it has met conditions to lift a crippling oil embargo and other sanctions imposed after its 1990 invasion of Kuwait, said U.S. Ambassador Madeleine Albright.

The sanctions were extended after the 1991 Gulf War to force Iraq to destroy its missiles and other weapons of mass destruction and to drop its claims to Kuwaiti territory.

Iraq contends shortages caused by the sanctions are inflicting suffering and death. Washington and its allies say Iraq can afford food and medicine for its people but is aggravating their suffering as a propaganda ploy.

Diplomats on the council did not say whether their decision to extend the oil embargo and other sanctions was affected by the reports of spending on luxury goods and palaces.

Iraq's top diplomat, Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz, rejected the U.S. claims about lavish spending on palace construction. "That's rubbish," Aziz said. "We have not only built palaces, we have built bridges, we've built hospitals and refineries and power stations that were bombed during the war."

Albright showed the council a dozen satellite photographs of construction of palaces throughout Iraq, diplomats said.

The photos show "a pretty extraordinary level of spending," said British Ambassador Sir David Hannay.

asked about crimes committed by the U.N. peacekeeping operation in Somalia, Rizza answered: "the least one would have expected was cooperation."

After the lecture, Rizza received questions from the audience. He was asked to list three lessons learned from previous peacekeeping operations. Rizza mentioned the weaknesses in the bureaucratic apparatus, the fact that Vietnam and Afghanistan where never brought to the United Nations and the need for more respect for the original principles of collective security.

Later he had to explain why some of the U.N. operations, mainly in Bosnia and Rwanda, had brought peace but not justice towards the solution of the conflict. According to Rizza "power shapes history not justice."

Rizza was reminded by a member of the audience that he was a citizen of Pakistan, but was trying to enforce peace settlements mandated by "colonial powers" that often went against the aspirations of people of the third world. He responded that there was little he could do about the situation.

Outside of the UMass ROTC program, Correia has done exemplary work in her academics, received a plethora of scholarships and awards and finished in the top 10 percent of 3,800 in a Nurse's Summer Training Program last summer.

She was paired with a nurse who trained her and assigned her tasks, such as handling blood specimens, operate intravenous systems, distribute chemotherapy drugs and, in one instance, help to deliver a baby, Correia said.

"It gave me the chance to practice technical skills, and come back to school with an edge," Correia said. "I wanted to do something extracurricular, get real-life experience, better leadership skills and be exposed to the army-like lifestyle."

Correia plans on becoming an active duty army nurse and applying for the Pediatric Nurses Course, which would increase her knowledge and skills in giving direct care to children and infants, she said.

If Correia continues to keep her extracurricular activities harmonized with her school work, she is sure to attain her future goal of heading a surgical team.

Two break-ins in JA tower tally $2,850 in losses

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

There were two break-ins in the John Adams Residence Hall at the University of Massachusetts this weekend.

There was a total loss of $2,850 worth of property.

One of the incidents took place on the ninth floor on Saturday, and the other was on the 16th floor on Sunday.

The room on the ninth floor was not locked and the room on the 16th floor was, according to University of Massachusetts police officials.

Someone entered a room on the ninth floor where two people were sleeping, went into one of their desks and stole $350 worth of property, police said.

The stolen property consisted of two pairs of gold earrings, a wrist watch and a diamond ring, police said.

In a separate incident, an individual reported on Sunday that someone had broken into her room on the 16th floor while she and her roommate were away for the weekend, the police said.

A word processor, printer, CD player, several gold rings and other personal belongings were stolen.

The total property stolen is estimated at more than $2500, police said.

The roommates had locked their door at 6:15 p.m. on Thursday, before leaving for the weekend.

One of the roommates returned Sunday evening and immediately reported the break-in to the police, police said.

The case is under investigation, police said.

This resulted in a 40 hour high speed chase. Tragically, the wheels of the limo spun out on a bunch of bananas that had dropped out of the bed of a produce truck, and George's limo careened into the truck of a traveling Hungarian circus. Terrified from the wreck, George, as fate would have it, labored in the monkey cage. The cage was lined with

Opinion/Editorial

PC terms lead to discrimination

Peter Orvetti

The movement toward proper and righteous nomenclature has coined a new phrase, "people of color." Thurgood Marshall must be rolling over in his grave.

The term is a rejection of Brown v. Board of Education by the very people that decision was forged to protect. The proponents of the "people of color" label are stating that they are, in fact, separate but equal.

This single term is meant to incorporate a vast number of cultures into one group. It erroneously supposes that Africans, Asians and Latina/os are all members of the same race.

The "people of color" term is an insult to each of these cultures. A person born in Bolivia has about as much culture in common with a Korean as with someone born in Nebraska: not much.

Just another step in the march toward semantic purity that passes for race relations today, "people of color" has itself become a racist term. It is so ridiculously broad that it includes Sicilians.

What "people of color" means is non-White. This is perhaps a valid differentiating point. Whites have traditionally been the aggressors against other cultures, bringing about nearly all of the racial discrimination and ethnic prejudice that now exists. While other cultures have brought about animosity through their historical relations — Muslim/Hindi tensions, for example — White colonialism is the chief example of outsiders entering and dominating, from the British exploitation of Africa and India to the American conquests of Mexico and Central America.

(At the same time, let's not forget those people of non-color, too, who came to the United States from Ireland, Poland and Germany and faced harsh discrimination.)

But "people of color" is racist to those under its auspices. It denies the innate differences between these many cultures that makes them worth celebrating and honoring.

"People of color" negates the ceremonies and artwork of Africa. It devalues the religious ritual and philosophical traditions of Asia. It denies the bitter history of the old societies of America and their co-mingling with the Spanish that brought about modern Latina/o culture.

To examine the issue from a White — that is, European — perspective, it is like saying that French, Italian and Russian culture are all the same because the skin color is. That's foolish. But, from our Eurocentric vantage point, it doesn't seem odd to consider Africans, Asians and Latina/os "all the same thing": people of color.

The term is just another regressive separation of groups. That is the trend today. Instead of looking for similarities and points of comfort between cultures that can lead to greater understanding, we attempt to categorize one another, and ourselves, in a paranoid attempt to prove that everyone else hates us.

We first categorized by race and gender. Religion was not long to follow; then came age, and sexual orientation. Now, we turn to culture. Instead of celebrating our individuality, we try to emphasize our differences. Eventually, each of us will be alone, in tiny boxes, content in our universal discrimination.

For example, it would seem logical for a lesbian Latina to be at home with both lesbians of all races and Latina/os of all sexual orientations.

Today, we do the opposite. She may shun non-Latina lesbians, and non-lesbian Latinas, leaving herself to commune with only her smaller, select group. When we each add in all of our differences, and separate ourselves from everyone who doesn't match, we will quickly end up by ourselves.

The mere phrase "people of color" is not to blame, but it is a symptom of a movement in the wrong direction. Multiculturalism is the best thing about the United States, and, given our colonial and racist past, it is a miracle that it exists. We must move toward inclusion and celebration, not exclusion and distrust. Ending racism against ourselves would be a great place to start.

Friends can make a difference

A.J. Stewart

I hate my friends. They complain too much, they gossip continually, and some of them smell bad. They always want to do evil things, such as setting fire to Burger Kings or getting into fights with naked French Canadians. But above all, I hate my friends because they take up so much of my time.

Time I could be spending watching television or brushing my teeth or mashing potatoes (my three favorite hobbies, in no particular order).

Why, if I didn't spend all day hanging out with my friends, I might even find time to do school work. Or work towards finding the school, if you like.

In truth, though, I really do appreciate the friends I have. I don't make friends very easily because I basically dislike everyone.

Not the people who read this column faithfully, of course. You and I are tight. You can come have wine and cheese with me anytime.

It's those other people I can't stand. I've made one friend all semester, and that brings the total to about 11 people. That is insane.

On this entire planet, there are only 11 people that I feel comfortable talking to. Eleven out of billions. That is sort of disheartening. But this shortage of friends is my own fault.

I refuse to write letters, call no one, and make zero effort. In some circles, I could be considered a classic jerk. And yet I have a group of hearty friends that hang out with me in spite of myself.

This week was a perfect example. A friend that I had been somewhat insensitive to helped me out on a day when I felt utterly alone with consequences. To her, I have all the love and gratitude in the world. It made me realize how lucky I am to know her.

It was a morning I'll never forget, with a person permanently in my memory, and hopefully, in my life. I don't know where I'd be without her, but it's probably close to misery. Insert witty transition here.

The weekend brought a trip to Montreal. That is where the Burger King and the French Canadians enter into events. It was three days of debauchery and vices, and a chance to see my friends perform on the road.

Aside from the six dollar beers at Club Super Sex and the ridiculous Canadian Monopoly money, it was a great weekend. I had the chance to see my friends relax and have fun, and we bonded by going through exploits such as trying to buy a hideous lime green sweatshirt off a barfly who only spoke French, or trying to haggle with Punjab, the evil bong salesman. And I thought, how much fun would I be having if I was here by myself? I would say not much at all. I now realize that friends have tremendous value, even though they don't have price tags.

One night in the hotel, we sat around drunk and stoned (a natural high) after an evening of bar hopping on St. Catherine Street. The topic turned to a debate over what was important in life. One friend said that beer is the answer. Another friend said that it was marijuana. For my part, I argued that sex was life's finest commodity, although not if you're paying for it. On reflection, I'd like to change my response.

Good friends are the most important thing you can have. They get you through the bad times, show you the way to the good times, and sometimes they even buy you Subway sandwiches with all the fixings. And this brings us to the moral of the story: don't overwork your friends. Even though they aren't perfect, they still need you just as much as you need them.

Sometimes we forget they're even there. Sometimes, all we can do is think of them. And sometimes, we laugh, and turn purple with asphyxiation.

Gender barriers in music

Alexis George

Why is it that women have never been fully initiated into the mysterious realm of the electric guitarist? That world of the sultry blues of B.B. King and the technical magic of Joe Satriani. There are so many famous, talented male guitarists. We listen to the music world constantly, to hear the sounds of Green Day's distorted guitars and the chiming guitars of the Beatles.

But . . . female guitarists?

Note the question mark. That little piece of punctuation says a lot about the slight air of surprise and doubt that marks society's reaction to women who play guitars. Especially electric guitars. It's just such a guy's instrument.

In the '60s, women like Judy Collins, Joni Mitchell and Joan Baez were enormous successes as folk singers, and they all played acoustic guitars. However, they became famous for their talents as singers and songwriters, not guitarists. The guitars were only there to accompany their singing.

Folk singing hasn't disappeared, but it hasn't changed much, either. Today we have women like Edie Brickell, Melissa Etheridge and the Indigo Girls, and they all play guitars, but again, they are singers and songwriters before they are guitarists.

The country music scene is slightly different. In contrast to popular music, it is split fairly evenly between men and women, and it isn't unusual to see women playing electric guitars. Country music can also boast of the fact that its female singers do not always have to link themselves very obviously with sex to be a success.

This cannot always be said of the popular rock scene. Two very contemporary women, both of whom play electric guitar, are Courtney Love and Liz Phair, and both have become famous for toying with pedophilia. To be sure, this is their ironic answer to society's male domination, and being a guitarist is obviously not their main objective.

However, it seems to imply that a woman can't get on in rock music by guitar abilities alone, whereas someone like "icon" Eric Clapton can.

That's not to say that there aren't any women who have become great musical successes as rock singers and guitarists. Ann and Nancy Wilson of Heart, Joan Jett and the Pretenders' Chrissie Hynde all play a mean guitar, but perhaps the only current singer who is known as much for her guitar playing as for her songs is Bonnie Raitt. Her talents as a slide guitarist are well-known, but if she is almost the only female guitarist whose solos are as important as her singing, then that is in sharp contrast to the fact that nearly every song by a man also showcases his guitar abilities.

I have to wonder why more women don't become solo players and "guitar goddesses." Maybe it is because they are not the traditional lone acts that men are. In this day and age of the women's movement, I would think that powerful guitar playing would be an exciting new vista for female musicians. They don't have to mimic the sweaty, chest- baring antics of Eddie Van Halen, but simply pick up a guitar and make it speak in ways men cannot. That air of doubt that society has towards women guitarists is only there because we don't know what they can do. Now is the time to make it perfectly clear just what women can do.

Project Pulse is useful

To the editor:

After reading Tracy Monahan's many negative comments pertaining to Project Pulse ("Notes from the Basement," Oct. 27), I felt compelled to respond. First, Tracy questions the "randomness" of the sampling method.

Let me assure everyone that all of our samples are drawn from the University data base using a systematic random sampling method. When one draws over 1,000 names upon 20 different occasions each academic year, individuals are going to be included in more than one survey sample.

According to one of our recent surveys, 66.5 percent of the 567 students we contacted reported having been called by Project Pulse only once since they have been at UMass. Fewer than 10 percent of the students reported having been contacted three or more times during their entire stay at UMass.

On another concern, Tracy questions why we do these surveys, especially when change on campus never seems to occur as a result of the surveys.

For everyone's information, Project Pulse surveys have been commissioned by a variety of groups on campus, including student groups such as the SGA, the Graduate Student Senate, SCERA and even the Collegian.

In addition, the following administrative offices routinely use our services: Health Services, COAP, Housing Services, Registrar's Office, Financial Aid Office and the Office of Human Relations for whom we conduct surveys on sexual harassment, racial/ethnic harassment, anti-Semitism and lesbian/gay/bisexual issues. Each of these organizations has used our survey data to change the way business is conducted on this campus.

While I think Tracy and I would agree that change on campus is often glacially slow, I would hope that she would also agree that we must keep trying.

Also, I trust she would agree that student opinion should not be overlooked when change is being considered, certainly, the vast majority of students believe their opinions are important.

Recently, in a Pulse survey, 98.6 percent of 567 students surveyed stated that it is very or somewhat important for "the campus administration to try to discover student opinion regarding policies and issues."

In my opinion, Project Pulse is one of the best ways to discover representative student opinion on issues. When faced with such student opinion, it is up to all of us (including the Collegian and its writers) to see that the opinions are used in the decision-making process.

Editorial strikes close to home

To the editor:

As I sat in the Bluewall last Monday, reading the Collegian and waiting to go to my next class, I almost spilled the coffee I was sipping as I began the article about eating. the author was talking about how she used to be obsessed with her weight and eating in general.

She explained how she didn't have what would physically be considered an eating disorder.

Yet, every time she ate she would be consumed with overpowering feelings of guilt. I was amazed because she was describing exactly how I feel. I could have written that article.

I, too, have anorexia because I do eat and I do not have bulimia because I do not purge when I eat, although sometimes I wish I could. Yet, I think about food all the time. I'm constantly going over my calorie and fat intake for the day to see what I can afford to have for dinner. Nothing in our apartment is not fat-free or the leanest brand available. We eat meat only occasionally and when we do it's usually chicken (skinless of course).

I hate going out to dinner because I can never really enjoy myself.

The whole time I'm eating, I'm thinking about the fat piling up inside me and how long I'm going to have to run that night to try burn some of it off.

The other day I was dying for an ice cream sundae as long as I didn't eat dinner that night.

Later that evening when I was starving and dared to have some soup, I felt guilty for the rest of the night.

If I look at myself realistically I know I'm not fat. Yet I can't stand to eat. I take appetite suppressants just so I'm not hungry, because I would rather not eat than have to feel so guilty afterwards if I do. It's a terrible way to feel. The most ironic thing is I really love food.

I am the least picky person when it comes to food. My dream would be able to eat as much food as I wanted and never gain any weight. Unfortunately this is an unrealistic hope because it will never happen. Instead I will have to count my fat intake each day and exercise continuously until I can someday, hopefully, learn to combat my guilt.

I don't have words of advice for others who feel the same way I do. If I did I probably wouldn't feel as I do myself. Instead, I chose to write this because I want others who are also obsessed with their weight to know they are not alone. Now I am going to go splurge and eat that carrot for dinner.

Television programs go on–line

Networks surf Internet, Delphi for new ways to reach viewers

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — You've just finished watching "Melrose Place" and would love to dish the dirt about Amanda's hairdo, wardrobe or skillful abuse of men.

But office cooler chat is a long, bleak nighttime away. So you sidle up to a source of instant gratification: the computer that will carry you into cyberspace to meet fellow 'Place junkies. Or fans of "The Nanny." Or Mike Judge, creator of "Beavis and Butt-head." Or Peter Jennings, who answered election day questions via computer. Or talk show host Greg Kinnear.

Increasingly, on-line services such as Prodigy, CompuServe, America Online and Delphi are helping TV networks open up a brave new world of marketing and promotion — ummm, we mean communication. The Internet, a worldwide amalgam of computer networks that is free to the public, is also abuzz with TV chatter.

"This gives a network an opportunity to build loyalty, to have a closer personal relationship with viewers," says Prodigy executive Barbara Bellaflore Sanden, who oversees on-line services for about 40 cable and broadcast networks.

And possibly attract more viewers? The success of the newly released science fiction film "Stargate" has been credited in part to an aggressive on-line campaign.

"It's a little early to tell, but that's part of what we're all betting on: This is another promotional tool to cut through all the clutter out there," Sanden says.

It's also, she noted, a way for networks to dip their toes into much-discussed interactivity, using computers for now instead of TV sets.

So-called "bulletin boards" that let computer users talk amongst themselves are a longtime on-line staple. In the past year, a growing number of actors, producers and network executives have begun sitting down for keyboard chats as well.

These may be scheduled "auditorium" question-and-answer sessions that allow on-line users to pose queries and get real-time responses via keyboard, typos and all.

Entertainment, as much as information, is the goal.

Asked by one fan if he'd ever had a paranormal experience, producer Chris Carter of Fox's eerie adventure series "The X-Files" replied: "I was audited by the IRS once. Beyond that, I'd have to say no."

Fran Drescher, star of the CBS sitcom "The Nanny," offered this advice on breaking into show business during a recent Q&A: "Start young, get into a play . . . or have a relative with the last name Sheen or a brother with the last name Baldwin."

A producer or network may browse through bulletin board comments to sample viewer comment. And it can be widespread: One "X-Files" fan logs in to Delphi from the North Pole; others come aboard from Australia.

"What I get from it is a certain, immediate feedback from people who are watching the show, a visceral reaction to what we're doing," says Carter, a regular reader of computer chat. "You don't have to wait for fan mail."

Viewers get to enjoy a shared passion. "It's like going to a good party and having a spirited debate," he says.

"There's a lot of fun, frivolous stuff out there, like the 'David Duchovny Estrogen Brigade' and the 'Gillian Anderson Testosterone Brigade,'" Carter says, naming on-line fan clubs for his series' stars.

The Internet, a worldwide amalgam of computer networks that is free to the public, is also abuzz with TV chatter.

Networks are beginning to use information gleaned from the computer in decision-making: Fox compiles a memo for department heads based on on-line comments, says network executive Charles Kennedy.

The initial reaction to the information gleaned from Delphi (owned by Fox parent company News Corp.) or the Internet was a quizzical "What is that?" Kennedy recalls. "Now, it's 'I have my ratings; where's my comments?' "

Networks also are pumping a stream of goodies and enticements out to cement the bond between viewers and programs and, in some cases, to turn computer flow into cash flow.

CBS, in conjunction with automaker Ford, created a Prodigy promotion for the miniseries "Scarlett" that includes giving away a free car.

Without cost, users can view and save color photos and video clips from programs. There are detailed episode guides, and organized on-line "conferences" about programs.

At this point, the on-line universe is small compared to the 98 percent of U.S. homes with television. Prodigy, one of the leading on-line services, has about 2 million members, who pay $9.95 for five hours on-line and $2.95 an hour thereafter.

And when they're sitting in front of their computers, not watching television, is that a network cause for concern?

"I think this probably makes people more interested in television," says Matt Jacobson, a Fox executive responsible for network Delphi activities.

Pumpkins videotape pure euphoria

By Mike MacLean

VIEUPHORIA
Smashing Pumpkins
Virgin Video

If you're a Smashing Pumpkins fan, their new video is a must for your collection. The video, entitled Vieuphoria, was released in conjunction with their collection of B-sides and rarities and is to go along with their collection of B- sides and rarities, and it never ceases to entertain.

The hour and a half video is a collection of live performances by singer/guitarist Billy Corgan, bassist D'arcy, guitarist James Iha and drummer Jimmy Chamberlin from all over the globe, as well as some pretty hilarious (and warped) interludes.

There are several songs done in Europe, including an acoustic "Cherub Rock" on MTV Europe and "Disarm" on British television. You would think that it was still the '70s by the looks of the superimposed background, but luckily the song is short and your eyes won't strain for long.

Also is an appearance made on Japanese TV, the likes of which makes the sets used on British TV look understated by comparison. The songs more than make up for the silly backgrounds, however.

Other songs on the collection include "Soma," a tune done beautifully in an outdoor garden with acoustic guitars and "Geek U.S.A.," which features a cup throwing fight between Corgan and a German audience. The only low point is the art rock-ish embellishment in the middle of "I Am One," but hey, that's what the fast-forward button was invented for, right?

In between the songs are some very warped and funny skits and footage, seemingly made up of just about anything they felt like throwing in, like Billy Corgan in a mid-'80s hairdo, looking like he just got thrown out of 'Til Tuesday.

In between the songs are some very warped and funny skits and footage, seemingly made up of just about anything they felt like throwing in, like Billy Corgan in a mid-'80s hairdo, looking like he just got thrown out of 'Til Tuesday. Some of the songs used in these features are the tunes that the band wrote in the pre-Chamberlin/drum machine era. Bad, but funny.

The Pumpkins have had rumors circulating for a long time that they don't get along, and they even play on this by setting up some fake therapy sessions for themselves.

James Iha gets to explain how the thought of what the rest of the band could have on their feet at any given time disturbs him and Jimmy Chamberlin gets to use representations of the rest of the band to vent his frustrations. He actually talks to a wooden duck meant to represent Billy Corgan.

Other interludes include a short film about James Iha's dog Bugg and a short documentary on The Frogs entitled Meet The Frogs. The World's Greatest Band. This latter effort is a twisted classic, sarcastically exposing the style of the self-important indie-rockers.

Most of the time Vieuphoria is above average in the sound and video quality and the performances are all above average. Plus, Jimmy Chamberlin talks to a wooden duck. 'Nuff said. A–

With the tides drifted in a shiny glass bottle with a newspaper inside. Deserted on the island alone for some time I thought it only obvious that I would examine the contents of the little ocean traveler. Upon smashing the bottle on a green bananna tree to open it, I realized it was a copy of The Mass Daily Collegian! Immediately I turned to the section containing the horoscopes to determine what my fate would be. It read - expect to be rescued sometime in the future from a present situation, and be polite to others you come in contact with.

"Swell," I thought. "I am going to be saved!" I leaned back against the big banana tree and dreamed of a better tomorrow. The Mass Daily Collegian- Just believe in it.

Black Affairs

BSU, ISO collaborate for cause

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

A joint coalition of University of Massachusetts student organizations has formed and will hold a meeting on Thursday in defense of a Black man who may have been wrongfully killed.

The International Socialist Organization, a Graduate Student Organization, and the Black Student Union have teamed to attack police brutality, specifically against unarmed Black males.

The victim in this case was Ben Schoolfield, a Black man fatally shot in Springfield by Officer Donald Brown, a White man.

On Feb. 7 of this year, Schoolfield was spotted and pulled over by Springfield police officers while driving a van that had falsely been reported stolen. The details thereafter are unclear, according to ISO spokesperson Jay Armstrong.

Armstrong said there are three versions of the story that the Springfield police have produced.

The first is that Schoolfield exited the van and was subsequently shot by Brown in a struggle. The two other versions state that Schoolfield struggled while inside the van, and the weapon accidentally discharged.

However, the five Black witnesses inside the vehicle say there was no altercation at all, Armstrong said.

Armstrong also noted several other events following the shooting that suggest the suspicious, and at times racist manner with which the case was dealt.

The District Attorney would not allow the five eyewitnesses to testify at the trial; investigation results were promised to the public within a week of Feb. 19, but never surfaced; and a flyer circulated around the Springfield Police Department in June congratulating Brown and inviting officers to a party in his honor.

The ISO and BSU decided to take action together after the acquittal of Brown by an all-White grand jury. Their efforts led to a meeting tomorrow night and a forum on Thursday.

The latter will include speeches by Jamie Lyles, the late Schoolfield's sister; Ahmed Shawki, Editor of Socialist Worker; and Shahedа Keels, a BSU member.

"We decided to co-sponsor the event to let the community at large know what's going on, and to kick off a campaign for justice for Ben Schoolfield," Armstrong said.

A coalition meeting will be held tomorrow at 8 p.m. in Room 805 of the Campus Center, followed two days later by another forum at 7 p.m. at 2131 Morrill Science Auditorium.

"Sheila's Day": A superior work of art

■ The play was a special success for Black women

By Njeri Thelwell
Collegian Correspondent

"This is a gathering of spirits...because we want to honor our mothers..."

These are the opening lines to the play "Sheila's Day" by Duma Ndulovu, one of the greatest productions to have graced the Rand Theater stage. It deals with the bond between and strength of women, as well as the work by Black women for their liberation in America and South Africa.

The singing was the root of the play because Africans and people of African descent traditionally express themselves through this medium.

The fact that this production played to a standing ovation every night since opening weekend is an indication of the importance of such a work of art. The director, musical director, designers and cast who worked diligently to bring this play to life really outdid themselves.

The singing was the root of the play because Africans and people of African descent traditionally express themselves through this medium.

Musical director Horace Clarence Boyer did a splendid job; working with talented singers like Natasha Springer and Vivi Majova must have made it that more enriching for him. The actors from Smith, Mount Holyoke and UMass blended their splendid voices in intricate harmony.

The music along with the moving acting and story of the play drew the audience into the performance, sometimes causing them to sing and speak out from their seats.

Under the ingenious direction of Roberta Uno the acting defined characters with distinct physical movements and vocal intonations, carrying the essence of the story. The lead actors, Nickawanna Shaw (Ruby Lee) and Dadawele Koyana (Quedusizi), are perfect examples of how the ensemble shifted from character to character and place to place with clarity and power.

Of special mention also are the performances of Nkenge Scott and Ritu Babihuga whose transformations produced scenes that took the viewer from comedy to tragedy in a heartbeat.

The play brought the audience up to date on past history and struggle of Black people. A testament to the success of the playwright's effort to link these struggles with present day reality was evidenced in the tears of both the older and younger women in the audience.

The audience was cleverly drawn into the lives of the women by the brilliant set design of Miguel Romero, which created a spiritual gathering place for both the actors and audience. Lighting designer Matthew Richards created a breath-taking effect strengthening and defining the space and story.

Prominent Harvard professor presents workshop, lecture on multiculturalism

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

One of the nation's foremost African-American educators will visit the Five College area this week, offering two forums on multiculturalism.

Dr. Alvin Poussaint, well-known author and Harvard professor, will present on Thursday both a workshop entitled "Creating a Multicultural Classroom" and a lecture entitled "Multiculturalism and Diversity in Education."

Poussaint is unique in that his achievements have stretched well beyond the boundaries of the classroom. Like most top– notch professors, he publishes on a consistent basis; however, he is also enjoying the benefits of writing incisive mainstream texts.

These works include Raising Black Children (which Poussaint co–authored) and Why Blacks Kill Blacks. His topics may be complex, but Poussaint addresses them with the same sort of authority that has solidified his reputation as one of the premier psychology professors in education today.

Certainly it was a true indication of Poussaint's impact on his admirers when he was asked by comedian and UMass alumnus Bill Cosby to serve as a consultant to The Cosby Show and its spin–off, A Different World.

Both shows were instrumental in presenting aspects of Black life previously unseen on network television. Not only were the programs tremendously popular, but their images of successful, intelligent Black families and college students paved the way for such current hits as Martin and Living Single.

Along with Cosby, Poussaint can surely be given credit for helping to breathe life into the stagnant stereotypes that have existed before.

Poussaint will try to pass on some of his knowledge in his workshop, the first of Thursday's two events. He focuses on a timely issue for many educators and parents, namely that of dealing with diversity in the academic environment.

Later in the evening, Poussaint will speak on the same topic in lecture format.

As professor of psychiatry at Harvard Medical School, Poussaint has had an immeasurable impact on both his peers and students. His upcoming presentation promises to be no different.

The workshop takes place at 3:15 p.m. at The Common School on 521 S. Pleasant St.; the cost is $15 to non–students and $12.50 to students.

At 7:30 p.m., the lecture begins in Johnson Chapel at Amherst College; the cost is $5 to non–students and $3.50 to students.

With the tides drifted in a shiny glass bottle with a newspaper inside. Deserted on the island alone for some time I thought it only obvious that I would examine the contents of the little ocean traveler. Upon smashing the bottle on a green banana tree to open it, I realized it was a copy of The Atlas Daily Collegian! Immediately I turned to the section containing the horoscopes to determine what my fate would be. It read - expect to be rescued sometime in the future from a present situation, and be polite to others you come in contact with.

"Swell," I thought. "I am going to be saved!" I leaned back against the big banana tree and dreamed of a better tomorrow. The Mass Daily Collegian- Just believe in it.

Minutewomen prepare for season

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

"It's time to put up or shut up," Massachusetts women's basketball Coach Joanie O'Brien said.

The Minutewoman basketball team is preparing for the upcoming season which will open Nov. 25 when UMass tangles with host Kentucky at the Lady Kats Tournament.

For O'Brien, whose team's record has improved in each season during her tenure, this is the year in which she hopes to contend for the Atlantic 10 title.

UMass Women's Basketball 1994 Season Preview

"Inexperience is no longer an excuse," said O'Brien, who guided the Minutewomen to a 14–14 record and a sixth place finish in the A–10 last year. "We have kids who are sophomores and juniors who have played more minutes than some kids do in their entire careers. We're ready to take that next step."

Expectations are high, as UMass has been picked to finish third in the division in the annual A–10 preseason coaches poll. They were chosen behind only Rutgers and George Washington, who tied for the conference's best record last year.

"We're much further along than we were last year," O'Brien said. "We have the core of our team back."

The team returns four of five starters, including junior forward Octavia Thomas and junior center Melissa Gurile, both All–American candidates.

Thomas, who led the Minutewomen in scoring and rebounding last season, was a member of last year's All A– 10 first team, and was named to the preseason first team this year. Gurile, second in both categories, and a second team selection last year, was picked to the A–10's preseason third team.

UMass' other two returning starters were both named to the A–10's All–Rookie team last year. Sophomore forward Crystal Carroll was the third leading rebounder on the squad and sophomore guard Beth Kuzmeski set a UMass single season record for three point shots attempted and made.

Other returnees for the Minutewomen include guards Cass Anderson, the team's lone senior, junior Tricia Hopson, a steady player who will see time at the point, and Nicole Carter, a sparkplug who started 10 games last year and will also play small forward.

The Minutewomen will miss the presence of Kim Gregory, last year's top reserve, who could miss the entire season due to injury. They will welcome several newcomers, however, including electrifying Sabriya Mitchell, a sophomore point guard who sat out last season due to Proposition 48.

Other newcomers include freshman forwards Tez Kraft and Kara Tudman.

"We are very versatile," O'Brien said. "We can go at least eight deep and feel comfortable."

"UMass is going to be an exciting team," said Rutgers head coach Theresa Grentz, whose Lady Knights have never been defeated by UMass. "Joanie's done an excellent job recruiting players."

The Minutewomen finished at 7–9 in the A–10 last year and defeated host St. Joseph's in the first round of the A–10 Tournament, 76–63. This marked the first time UMass had reached the semi–finals, and also the first time a host school had lost in the first round.

"I have a lot of respect for UMass," St. Joseph's coach Stephanie Gaitley said. "Joanie's done an outstanding job. You can be the best coach in the world, but without the best players, you won't win. I think Joanie has both this year."

COLLEGIAN FILE

Junior Octavia Thomas will once again be one of the leaders for the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team this year.

The team's overall record of 14–14 last year was their best since 1986–87 when the team went 14–12, and second best since 1979–80.

"UMass plays very physical and very hard," said West Virginia coach Scott Harrelson, whose squad split with the Minutewomen last season. "Octavia and Melissa are both great players, and UMass is going to be tough to beat. They will definitely make an impact on the conference."

The Minutewomen, like their fans, have high hopes for the season.

"We finally got some respect," Gurile said. "I think the opportunities are there to beat [GW and Rutgers]. If we play together, we can get things accomplished."

Tomorrow's paper will feature an in–depth look at the Minutewomen's frontcourt.

Women x–country ends season with heartbreak

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, the highly anticipated ECAC Championships very quickly became an unmitigated disaster of nearly apocalyptic proportions for the University of Massachusetts women's cross country team.

Much like the 12–3–3 field hockey team being snubbed from the NCAAs, this fiasco represented the women's cross country team's ultimate worst case scenario.

"A day that we were all looking forward to turned into a horrible, traumatic day," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said.

"But, that happens in life. You never know what can happen in athletics. There can be triumph or it can be heartbreaking. We're all heartbroken right now."

> Cross country is a team sport. Everybody counts the same, and with Melissa out our chances were cut."
> — Julie LaFreniere

Sophomore sensation Melissa Langevin, UMass' first ever Atlantic 10 Individual Champion, expected to qualify for the Nationals with a top 10 finish in the event, which drew 35 schools from throughout the Northeast. Unfortunately, her dreams were quickly shattered.

The course at Boston's Franklin Park narrows after the 200m point and makes a sharp right turn. As the top runners jostled for position, Langevin apparently stumbled and fell.

Unable to regain her footing, she was trampled by the 250 runners behind her, many of whom tried in vain to avoid the fallen Langevin.

Langevin suffered a 10 stitch gash in her right calf, a deep puncture wound in her right arm with some muscle damage, a possible hairline fracture of that arm, which is currently in a sling, along with many other cuts and bruises. She was taken to a nearby hospital where she was treated and later released.

"She was smart to curl up, stay down and use her arms to cover her head," LaFreniere said. "Otherwise, with runners wearing 3/8 inch spikes, it could have really been disastrous."

The troubles did not end there for the Minutewomen as Freshman Kirsten Bringardner tripped over the fallen Langevin, bruising her hip. The nagging pain hampered Bringardner as she placed well off of her typical pace.

Senior Julie Moreau, running in her final race, finished first for the Minutewomen in a time of 18:25 (51st overall).

"Julie had the best race of her collegiate career," LaFreniere said. "It was a great race for her. I think that the fact that she didn't know that Melissa had fallen was good for her.

"I think that many of my kids were distracted knowing that she was out. Many were thinking about Melissa and worrying about what was going on."

All–Atlantic 10 runner Rebecca Donaghue (18:34, 62nd overall) along with Kristin Donaldson (19:09, 113th), Molly Dunlap (19:46, 159th) and Cheryl Lyons (19:46, 160th) were all significantly off their usual times.

With concern for Langevin's well–being on their minds, the overall performance suffered as the team ended up finishing 22nd overall.

"Cross country is a team sport. Everybody counts the same, and with Melissa out our chances were cut," LaFreniere said. "We did not have a lot of depth to begin with and losing your No. 1 runner is tough. Never in my wildest dreams did I think we'd finish 22nd. I expected [Langevin] to finish 10th and we had to replace her with 160. That hurts."

1994 recap — This year will be remembered as a season of surprises.

Stupendous second place finishes at both the New England Championships and Paul Short Invitational kept the team's hopes high. The Paul Short saw a trio of Minutewomen set personal record times as the team knock– off powerful squads from St. Joseph's and Connecticut.

Donaghue, a freshman, garnering All A–10 honors was a pleasant surprise.

The Stow native won the conference's Rookie of the Week honor three times and placed eighth overall at the A–10 Championships.

Langevin, coming off of an injury plagued spring, shocked all by shattering the New Hampshire course record in the season opener, never looking back.

In every race that she has completed as a Minutewomen, she has placed first amongst all UMass runners.

Moreau and Lyons, both seniors, came on strong as the season winded down. Moreau's 18:25 at the ECACs Saturday was her high for the season and a valiant effort by the senior given the extenuating circumstances of the afternoon.

Donaldson and Bringardner both had solid campaigns providing the support and depth necessary to push the Minutewomen ahead of its competition on occasion.

After such an optimistic season, the bitter ending was hard to swallow.

"It's horrific, but hey, that's life," LaFreniere said.

Women's swimming loses a close one to Huskies

By Jamie Bearse
Collegian Staff

"It was a matter of someone finishing second instead of finishing first in one event," said University of Massachussett's women's swimming coach Bob Newcomb about the Minutewomen's 154–145 close loss in Boston on Saturday to Northeastern.

According to Newcomb, the Minutewomen went into Saturday's meet with two goals in mind: "to beat Northeastern overall, and to beat Northeastern just in swimming."

"Our diving squad is still developing and couldn't overcome the powerful diving team of Northeastern," he said. "But we beat them in swimming, although the points just didn't add up in our favor."

UMass fell to the Lady Huskies, to even their record to 1– 1, despite a stellar performance by some of the Minutewomen's key swimmers.

Among them was junior Jess Griffith, who led the Minutewomen in points with 40, and captured first in the 100 and 200 yard breast stroke, along with a share of first in the 400 yard medley relay and the 400 yard freestyle relay.

"Jess was a big contributor to the success of the team this past Saturday and will continue to do so," Newcomb said.

Freshman Karen Sonnwald continued to shine on Saturday setting a school record in the 1,000 yard freestyle with a time of 10:30.11. She also captured first in the 500 yard freestyle finishing with 18 total points.

Sophomore Barbara Hickey had an "outstanding" meet, according to Newcomb.

Hickey also swam the 1,000 yard freestyle achieving her personal best with a time of 10:48.11.

"This is the first time in women's swimming that we have two women able to swim under a 10:50 time in the 1,000 yard freestyle," Newcomb said. "Barbara is developing a lot quicker than expected. It shows in the pool and in her workouts."

Despite an illness all week, Sarah Baker fought through and finished with 35 total points. She captured first in the 50 yard freestyle, a share of first in the 400 medley relay and 400 yard freestyle relay, and she finished second in the 100 yard freestyle, missing first by 6 hundredths of a second.

"It makes you wonder how well she's going to do once she gets better and older," Newcomb said.

Another freshman who stepped up and made a "big impact" according Newcomb was Irina Kossenko.

Kossenko finished first in the 200 yard back stroke edging out teammate Barbara Banks.

She also captured second in the 200 yard butterfly, finishing ahead of all other teammates.

"Everyone hates to lose," Newcomb said. "But I'm happy with the way the team is coming along."

According to Newcomb, the loss has not gotten the Minutewomen down and "they know they beat Northeastern in the water."

"What they are doing is right, but you don't start seeing results in the win column right away," Newcomb said. "Come February, we will be able to swim and dive with any team."

UMass will be travelling back to Boston this Saturday to face a powerful Boston University team.,

Newcomb is hoping that the meet against the Terriers will prepare his team for the New England wide swim meet the following week.

Men's gym hope for a shot at league championship

By Jody King
Collegian Staff

Losing only one senior from last year's record breaking team along with adding an outstanding freshmen five, will give the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team a good chance at winning the league championship this year.

With a level of difficulty higher than UMass has ever seen, the Minutemen are planning quite a show for their opponents and fans.

Performing in the preseason gym extravaganza, four Minutemen hit their pommel horse routines with precision.

"To have four guys hit their routines this early, before the season even starts, shows something about the skill and depth of this year's team," UMass Coach Roy Johnson said.

The extravaganza was a show hosted in the Boyden Gymnastics Center two weeks ago featuring the UMass men's team and the Hampshire Gymnastics School as well as the UMass funk club and the dance club. The Minutemen dazzled the spectators in the standing room only crowd.

The Minutemen will be showing their skills this season and performing many tricks new to the squad.

On floor, last years leaders, sophomores Ruslan Shupak, Lorenzo Macaluso and Gabe Columbus will be joined by freshman Kevin Schwartz, who will perform two difficult skills. One of these skills is a half twist to a double front somersault. The only other gymnast to perform this skill in the UMass Boyden Gymnastics Center was two–time All– American Tammy Marshall, a 1993 UMass graduate and one of the most celebrated student–athletes in UMass history. Marshall scored a perfect 10.0 on the skill.

"Kevin will be doing two difficult moves. The half twist double front somersault will be great to watch. It is a very hot, very difficult skill," Johnson said.

Another big event for the Minutemen will be the still rings. Ruslan Shupak tied the school record at 9.7 last year to become a regional qualifier and Chris Funk missed qualifying by merely hundredths of a point, scoring a 9.65. UMass is looking to its newcomers to step up and score with Shupak and Funk, rounding out the event for UMass.

"If one more person on our team can step up and score with these guys, we could be the No. 1 ranked team in the country on the still rings," Johnson said.

Shupak will also compete on a high level for the Minutemen on the vault, hitting a triple front somersault, a skill that was only performed by one other gymnast in the country last year. Shupak's score, the second high score of the qualifying meet for regionals, would have made him an All–American if he had acquired it at Nationals.

Adding to the excitement of the Minutemen's show, on the horizontal bar, co–captain Jay Santos will perform a new laid out reverse heck, another trick that not many gymnasts do. Santos is currently working on nailing two in a row, a trick that has never been seen at the NCAA's.

UMass is gearing up for this season already and have their sights set high.

The Minutemen are expecting to pose a threat for the New England Championships. Teamwise, UMass is setting its sights on regional competition.

"We will probably have several guys qualifying for regionals, if not nationals," Johnson said.

UMass ranked No. 3 in AP preseason basketball poll

By Jim O'Connell
Associated Press

Arkansas, the defending national champion with five returning starters, was the overwhelming choice Monday in The Associated Press preseason college basketball poll.

The Razorbacks, who capped last year's 31-3 mark with a title game win over Duke in Charlotte, N.C., received all but three of the 66 first-place votes cast by the national media panel. "This is the first time Arkansas has ever been ranked No. 1 in the preseason," Coach Nolan Richardson said Monday. "Anytime we accomplish a first, it means our program has improved."

North Carolina (28-7), last year's preseason No. 1, was second with one first-place vote and 1,490 points, 156 behind Arkansas, which was ranked No. 1 for nine weeks last season.

Massachusetts (28-7), which plays Arkansas on Nov. 25 in the season opener for both, was third with 1,391 points.

"This speaks highly of our players and what they've accomplished," Richardson said. "I'm happy and proud to be the preseason No. 1 team but, by being No. 1, we've put ourselves in a position where every game is a championship caliber game. We used to be the hunter; now we're the hunted."

Kentucky was fourth, followed by Arizona, UCLA, Maryland, Duke, Indiana and Florida. Kentucky and Maryland each received one first-place vote. Arizona and Florida were the other teams in last year's Final Four.

Kansas led the Second Ten and was followed by Syracuse, Cincinnati, Virginia, Georgetown, Michigan, Wisconsin, Alabama, Connecticut and Michigan State.

The last five teams in the poll were Oklahoma State, Villanova, Georgia Tech, Wake Forest and Illinois.

All but six of the Top 25 came from four conferences with the Atlantic Coast leading the way with six (North Carolina, Maryland, Duke, Virginia, Georgia Tech and Wake Forest).

The Big Ten had five teams (Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Michigan State and Illinois) and the Southeastern Conference and Big East had four apiece.

Only three preseason No. 1s went on to win the national title, North Carolina in the first preseason poll in 1982-83, UNLV, 1989-90, and Duke, 1991-92. Six preseason No. 1s managed to hold that same spot in the year's final balloting which is conducted before the NCAA tournament.

Heterosexual allies support Gay Awareness Day

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

Be a friend. Be an ally. Be aware.

That was the theme yesterday as a group of students from Professor Bonnie Strickland's Psychology 390C presented Gay Awareness Day.

A combination of videos, music, resources, speeches and education, Gay Awareness Day was an all day event designed to increase campus awareness of gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender issues.

One of the most striking things about the event was the strong and vocal presence of heterosexual allies, people who support GLBTs while being proud of their own heterosexual orientation.

Bonnie Strickland, the course instructor for Psychology 390C: The Lesbian Experience, said Gay Awareness Day is one of the few times she has seen an awareness event sponsored and promoted by a predominantly heterosexual group of students.

According to Rich LaBella, a UMass junior majoring in psychology, being a heterosexual ally means "just to be supportive in a way that everyone should be, because the difficulty with these groups is that not everybody is an ally."

Showing support for popular causes is easy, LaBella said, but when the cause is unpopular, people tend to shy away.

Senior psychology major Amanda Willius said heterosexual allies are going to be key in winning rights and respect for gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender people.

Every time a heterosexual speaks out against homophobia, or supports GLBTs, he or she is making a statement to society, Willius said.

"It's alright to be heterosexual and have interest in GLBT issues. You don't have to be a minority to be worried about prejudice," Willius said.

"It just didn't make sense."

Freshman Peter DeGlopper, a double-major in computer science and English said growing up, his family never gave him negative ideas about gays, bisexuals, or transgender people. Yet, he said going through school he received the usual homophobic "indoctrination."

He said one day he sat down to think about what everyone was saying. It didn't make sense to him that people would be so upset about sexual orientation, and he decided that it wasn't going to bother him. He said he became an ally.

"I have way too many friends that are queers of some sort not to be one (an ally)," DeGlopper said.

Showing support for popular causes is easy, but when the cause is unpopular, people tend to shy away.

"The little things you do"

Allies come in many different forms, LaBella said.

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

Graduate students Phil Gullion and Amy Stephenson fill out surveys as part of Gay Awareness Day on the Student Union steps yesterday. The event featured artists and speakers, information about the Gay community, and allowed participants to fill out surveys on awareness.

Sometimes being an ally means speaking up when people around you are using homophobic slurs, according to LaBella.

"It's the little things you do every day that make the difference," LaBella said.

She also said every time you raise your voice against homophobia, you make someone stop and think. And when you stop and think about it, it just doesn't make sense, LaBella said.

On Gay Awareness Day, many people did just that; they stopped and thought about GLBT issues.

Two tables were set up by the Student Union steps, and people gathered all day to ask questions, pick up resources, enjoy music by queer artists, and show support.

At the beginning of the day, the tables attracted a wide variety of students. Some showed interest in GLBT issues, while others were curious about the crowd.

Pink triangle cookies were given to those who filled out surveys on awareness, and visitors were invited to take copies of resource lists and local periodicals such as OutRight Family and Metroline.

Throughout the day a CD player blasted the sounds of Melissa Etheridge and Tracy Chapman, while a VCR ran videos such as The Times of Harvey Milk and Pink Triangles.

Urge for allies

From noon to 1 p.m., speakers took to the microphone to deliver speeches on GLBT issues, including biphobia, nature v. nurture, coming out, and human rights.

Kelly Hayes, a senior majoring in Women's Studies, used her speech to stress the importance of heterosexual allies.

"I think one of the important things that heterosexual allies do is that they make it OK for people to support gay rights without having to be gay," she said.

Skye Reed, a senior IDIC major and project coordinator had a message for the heterosexual people who attended the event and are in the position to be allies.

"Show what you learned today and pass it on," Reed said.

State regulations aim to help gay, lesbian youths

By Martin Finucane
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Gay and lesbian youths — harassed and scorned inMassachusetts schools in the past — will soon get help fromteachers who understand their problems, state education officials said Tuesday.

The state Board of Education has approved regulations that will result in teachers being trained to deal with the problems of gay and lesbian public school students.

Activists say many young people feel isolated in school and suffer intense emotional pain as they come to grips with being homosexual.

In 1989, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services reported homosexual teens as much as three times more likely to attempt suicide than their heterosexual peers.

"Gay youth are very much in crisis at this point," said David LaFontaine, chairman of the Governor's Commission on Gay and Lesbian Youth.

"What this means is that from now on every teacher in Massachusetts will learn about gay student rights . . . It's an enormous step forward," LaFontaine said.

Officials said Massachusetts is one of the first states to require such training as part of a teacher's state certification requirements.

The teacher training requirement approved last month is part of a broader campaign in the state to improve conditions in the state's schools for gay and lesbian youth.

Martin Kaplan, chairman of the education board, said the new regulations were a "continuation of the American commitment to equal treatment of all of our people."

Kaplan said the next step should be gay and lesbian training programs for teachers at colleges and universities statewide.

Alan Safran, a spokesman for the Department of Education, said it would be up to the state's colleges and universities themselves to develop specific lessons on gay youth. The board's regulations merely say teachers, to be certified, must be able to address discrimination based on "sexual orientation."

Some people say it is immoral to encourage gay and lesbian youths to accept their homosexuality.

"It is very wrong to indoctrinate teachers that the homosexual and lesbian lifestyles are simple alternatives rather than very complicated and very difficult behaviors," said Kristi Hamrick, spokeswoman for the Family Research Council, a conservative, pro-family group in Washington.

Author criticizes UMass' hiring

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

A conservative author criticized the University of Massachusetts' hiring policy by claiming that it protected pedophiles from discrimination.

George Roche, author of The Fall of the Ivory Tower, wrote that the UMass hiring policy protected individuals who have sex with children.

The hiring policy has been revised and the sexual orientation clause referred to has been removed, according to Danny Chun at the UMass News Office.

Although the clause in the policy is outdated now, the information is still being cited.

Roche wrote that UMass has defined pedophiles as a protected minority in its non-discrimination code, according to Robert E. Nordlander, a Wisconsin specialist in social criticism.

Imprimis, a publication at Hillsdale College in Michigan where Roche is the president, repeated these facts in it's October 1994 issue. Nordlander said. Hillsdale is reputable for being a conservative, right-wing institution.

UMass was one among 1,000 colleges that were referred to in Roche's book.

Roche also cited the University of Iowa for its open recruitment of a lesbian couple into its law school faculty in 1991, and Auburn University, in Texas, whose student senate has been threatened with a lawsuit for refusing to charter a gay and lesbian group.

The code that both Roche and Imprimis were referring to actually said that people could not be discriminated against because of their "sexual orientation," Nordlander said. They interpreted this as a policy which included pedophiles.

UMass does not hire pedophiles, or condone other deviant forms of behavior, like necrophilia or bestiality, either, Chun said.

The clause, inserted by a university attorney during a 1990 revision of the anti-discrimination code, was removed by the board of trustees, Chun said. They did not want to single out one form of deviancy for sanction, and imply acceptance or justification of other forms.

President of NOW to debate on issue of "Feminism and the Bible"

By Kathryn Silver
Collegian Correspondent

Tonight at Smith College a discussion will take place entitled "Feminism and the Bible: Do they share any common ground?." The discussion will feature Patricia Ireland, president of the National Organization for Women (NOW).

Ireland took over the presidency of NOW in May of 1991 after former president Mary Yard suffered a stroke. According to an article published in Newsweek magazine that same year, Ireland, "pledged to attract a new generation into NOW, which had received criticism for failing to address the concerns of younger women."

In the Newsweek article Ireland cites two moments in her feminist awakening.

The first took place while she was an undergraduate at the University of Tennessee. A calculus professor at the time mocked a question she asked, making a derogatory comment about teaching "girls."

The second incident occurred while Ireland was working as a flight attendant for Pan Am in the late 1960s. She discovered that the only women that the airline's health care policy covered was for the health care costs for spouses of male employees.

Ireland turned to NOW for support in a case against the airline. With the help of the organization, she won her complaint. After this, she became a member of NOW.

After taking over the presidency in 1991, Ireland called for more government policies concerning violence against women and an increase in medical attention to female issues, including abortion.

Black militant group to discuss prison riot

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

A Black militant group that was dormant for years will be represented in its new form tomorrow night, along with films about an infamous prison riot.

As part of a presentation sponsored by the Alliance for Student Power entitled "The Attica Prison Rebellion: Black Panthers Yesterday and Today," speakers from the New Black Panther Party will speak following the two films which deal with the Attica Prison rebellion of 1971.

The event takes place in the Student Union Ballroom at 7 p.m., and is free of cost.

During the prisoners' takeover and siege of the penitentiary, several guards and inmates were killed, making it one of the bloodiest prison revolts of recent times.

As originally formed by Huey Newton and Bobby Seale in the late 1960s, the Panthers' mission was to serve and protect the Black community of Southern California against police brutality. Membership grew nationally as the decade proceeded, as did the number of standoffs with the law, particularly the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The Black Panthers were an important icon of the "Black is Beautiful" era; many prominent Black figures, such as Angela Davis and Eldridge Cleaver, became associated with the party over the years.

Yet, by the beginning of the 1970s, the Panthers

Teach-in focuses on U.S. military interventions in Haiti

By Juan Jose Chacon Quiros de Quetzalcoatl
Collegian Staff

The United States justified the military operation in Haiti by stressing the importance of restoring order in the face of political instability in the island. Were they talking about 1915 or 1994?

The teach-in, "Imperialism and Democracy: Understanding U.S. interventions in Haiti" that took place last night at the Campus Center, drew comparisons between the two invasions by trying to examine the reasons for these operations.

"How can we make sense of the intervention? You probably saw the cheers on CNN," said Mary Renda, a visiting assistant professor of History and of Women's and Gender Studies at Amherst College.

Renda read two stories from Newsweek that portrayed the Haitian population as content with the U.S. military intervention. According to Renda there are many misconceptions in the United States about its involvement in the region.

Renda said she was deeply troubled by the historical echoes of these interventions. "In 1915, just as in 1994 we couldn't have known the real reasons."

After a relatively easy invasion, the Marines encountered brutal guerrilla warfare in 1915. Haitian accounts put the death toll at 16,000 and talk about "indiscriminate killing."

To illustrate the extent of these actions, Renda read a segment from a military training manual written by the United States Marine Corps. According to the manual "in some instances it will be necessary to overrun the entire country, like in Haiti."

Renda also explained the meaning of the "American idea in Haiti." First coined by Adolf Miller in 1915, it's a system in which economic development is reduced to the provision of jobs.

In 1915, it meant enforcing on peasants coercive labor contracts for public infrastructure works. In 1994 it means industrialization through export-oriented activities.

The economic agenda consists, according to Renda, of moving from a plantation agriculture system to "a sweatshop model of development."

The rhetoric of democracy has been used in both situations to justify the intervention. Renda explained how during the first occupation, which lasted until 1934, the patriots fighting the United States were illegitimized by being calling "bandits."

JUAN JOSE CHACON QUIROS DE QUETZALCOATL / COLLEGIAN

Moise Tirado, President of the Haitian American Student Association, was one of two speakers who talked about American intervention in Haiti at the Campus Center last night.

In the current situation, the United States has attempted to create a "counterbalance" by crushing rising popular movements.

"Aristide was elected because of the people that had died before, but it frightened the United States because he was a radical priest," said Moise Tirado, president of the Haitian American Student Association (HASA).

According to Tirado, President Bush sent Jimmy Carter to Haiti when it became clear that Aristide was going to win the elections.

"Carter tried to offer money to Aristide but it didn't work," said Tirado.

Mary Renda added that Aristide would not be in power today if the United States had succeeded in its campaign to discredit him.

Tirado explained how an army trained by the United States with generals under CIA payroll ousted Aristide in 1991.

"The U.S. Ambassador would drive around the city with Cedras while people were getting killed," he said. According to Tirado, the answer is to cut the problem at the source.

"Haiti does not need a military," Tirados said. He explained how at the same time people in Haiti don't want an army, the United States is trying to reorganize it.

The FRAPH, a paramilitary group organized by the CIA is responsible for the killings of members of Lavallas, the democracy movement that brought Aristide to power, according to Renda.

She explained later how this movement was portrayed as dangerous in the United States, but that people should

Dollar Ends Mixed Gold Price Rises

LONDON (AP) — The U.S. dollar was narrowly mixed today against other major currencies in early European trading. Gold prices were higher.

Currency traders were awaiting developments from a meeting later today of policymakers for the U.S. Federal Reserve. The central bank is expected to boost interest rates by a half percentage point.

Rising rates normally make a country's currency more attractive to foreign investors.

In Tokyo, the dollar closed at 98.17 yen, up 0.08 yen from Monday's close.

Later in London, the dollar was quoted at 98.20 yen up from 98.15 yen late Monday.

The British pound was quoted at $1.5895, up from $1.5885 late Monday.

Other dollar rates compared with late rates Monday included: 1.5411 German marks, down from 1.5415; 1.2945 Swiss francs, up from 1.2940; 5.2965 French francs, down from 5.2968; 1.7295 Dutch guilders, unchanged; 1,582.25 Italian lire, down from 1,583.00, and 1.3603 Canadian dollars, up from 1.3577.

Stocks Fluctuate due to Fed Activity, End Mixed

NEW YORK (AP) — Stocks closed mixed Tuesday after zooming up and down wildly as investors struggled to figure out the implications of an aggressive 0.75 percentage point boost in short-term interest rates by the Federal Reserve Board.

The rate increases were within the range that had been predicted, but computerized trading programs helped spur volatile swings in prices after the Fed released its decision at about 2:20 p.m. EST.

Analysts said the gyrations illustrate the conflict between investors who favor the rate increases — to slow economic growth and curb rising inflation — and those who think the hikes will bring on a recession.

Fed officials have now raised rates six times this year in an effort to keep the economy walking the thin line between these two extremes, giving it a "soft landing," in Fed jargon.

Crops Overcome Early Lows, Make Gains

CHICAGO (AP) — Soybean futures prices overcame early losses to end higher Tuesday on the Chicago Board of Trade. Grain futures prices finished lower.

Soybeans futures prices overcame early losses tied to China's cancellation of a large order for palm oil and news that Russia will buy significantly less vegetable oil this winter.

Investors flocked to the market after large commodity fund houses, which are holding major stakes in the future, did not sell off, said Joel Karlin, research analyst with Kemper Securities Inc. in Chicago.

Soybean futures have made gains recently in step with increases in soybean oil prices.

Corn and wheat futures prices faced continued pressure from poor export prospects amid large supplies.

Wheat for December deliver fell 2 1/4 cents to $3.78 1/4 a bushel; December corn fell 1/4 cent to $2.16 3/4 a bushel; December oats fell 1/4 cent to $1.25 1/4 a bushel; November soybeans rose 4 1/2 cents to $5.60 1/4 a bushel.

Forum discusses racism and criminal justice

By Adam Rattner
Collegian Correspondent

Last night, there was a discussion on racism and the criminal justice system in the Campus Center. The discussion was a part of prisoner awareness week. The open forum included such topics as racism, classism, economics, and oppression.

Representatives from the Alliance for Student Power (ASP) began the discussion. Some people refused to be identified and gave false names, while others remained unidentified.

"The government is planning to build more prisons because as the classes separate crime will increase," said one speaker, who wished to be known as Bob Smith. "How do we solve this problem?"

"What strategies do we have to fix the system," asked one unidentified man. "I don't think that everyone has it in their head that they are profiting from someone else. Most people don't realize they are living in the lap of luxury."

There was a wide response to the unidentified man's comments. Amy Gould of the ASP said, "If O.J. Simpson didn't have the plethora of wealth that he had, he would have been put in prison a while ago, because he is a big, dark man."

"We shouldn't just think of upper class as white and lower class as Black," said the man who wished to be called Bob Smith. "There are exceptions." He used an unidentified Nigerian man sitting in the audience as an example of someone who lives in a place where the upper class is almost all Black.

The unidentified man from Nigeria said "There is a conspiracy. I have a friend who is a political prisoner in Africa. He was protesting Apartheid, and has become a 'prisoner of conscience.'"

The topic of Texas and its prison death rate was discussed very much.

"Texas kills more people than every state combined," said a man wished to be known as Harry Smith. "It used to be about 200 people a year. It's getting worse."

One man who drew many reactions said, "Afro-Americans use less drugs but are arrested at a much higher rate than White Americans. I think it's the representation of Afro- Americans in the media that needs to change to improve conditions."

"These prisons are defiantly being used to control people, said Gould. "They are living in conditions for animals, they are treated like animals, and they are becoming animals."

The topic shifted to discuss economic systems. A man who wished to be called Bill Smith said, "In a country where more people own TVs than refrigerators, and toilets we kneed to become more aware; we kneed a violent revolution."

In response to the later comment a man said, "Do we kneed a violent revolution or do we kneed more people like Ghandi?"

"Is it really in the interest of the working class to perpetuate racism? Things are becoming more polarized. The system will oppress whoever it can to use it as a fuel for the system," said the man who wished to be called Bob Smith.

There will be continuing discussions for Prisoner Awareness Week throughout the week.

New RSO slides its way on campus

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

Skis and poles are no longer necessary on many slopes — especially those ridden by members of the new snowboarding club at the University of Massachusetts.

"It is about time there is a club for snowboarders," said first year student Deidre Levine, at the first meeting of Circle, the UMass snowboarding club.

A group of about 50 snowboarders gathered for Circle's first "general joe meeting" this past Monday in the basement of Mary Lyon Residence Hall.

"We want to give snowboarders a chance to unite and ride together, while meeting new people," said Circle's President senior Jim Rose.

According to Rose, he got together with first year student Andre Vippolis and decided to revive the formerly inactive club, which is now in the process of becoming a Registered Student Organization (RSO).

"We should be an RSO by next week, and we will be supported by the University," Rose said.

However, the club needs money to get started, Vippolis said. He told the group the there would be a $15 fee for dues.

"It is a one time fee to help us get things going and to buy equipment," he said.

Circle is looking into discounted lift tickets and rentals for its trips to various mountains throughout Vermont and Massachusetts.

Rose said Circle is already affiliated with Fast Trax, a snowboard shop in Easthampton. The club will be able to get demo boards and rent equipment at discount prices from the shop.

"We would like to get some videos for beginners and try out some boards from Fast Trax once the snow falls," Rose said.

According to Vippolis, Circle wants to run a trip every weekend of the season. "We want to get as much riding time as possible," Rose said. They are also interested in running a week long trip to the Midwest and one to the U.S. Ski Open in March.

Rose and Vippolis were open to suggestions about all issues, and asked for input from the riders.

"These are all ideas, but this is your club, we go where you want to go," Vippolis said.

After the meeting, the group's response was enthusiastic and many students lingered to speak with the club leaders.

"I want to get more into snowboarding, and this club will give me the connections to a happening sport," said Ezra Livingston, a first year student.

Vippolis' reaction to the meeting was also positive.

"Tonight we brought people with a common interest together. We hope to turn more people on to this great sport and the snowboarding scene, and ride some new terrain this season," Vippolis said.

Circle will hold its next meeting at 9 p.m., Nov. 29 in the basement of Mary Lyon Residence Hall in Northeast Residential area.

Money persuades students' decisions according to 'who's who' survey

By Carole Feldman

WASHINGTON (AP) — Some of America's top high school students say they would consider sex with a stranger — for a price.

They want big bucks, a car, a dream job or admission to the college of their choice, according to a survey of more than 3,000 teens.

The 25th annual survey of high achievers by Who's Who Among American High School Students found that one-quarter of the responding juniors and seniors said they had engaged in sexual intercourse.

The vast majority of the students who responded were white and attended public schools. Most were girls, more than half from small towns or rural areas and more than half in families with incomes between $30,000 and $70,000. 98 percent said they intended to go to college.

The survey's results would not be statistically valid for students in general. The questions were mailed to a select group, and less than half the students responded.

Nearly 35 percent of the sexually active teens said lack of a condom would not deter them, and 83 percent thought their risk of contracting AIDS was low or non-existent.

As for other potentially risky behavior:

— 19 percent of the responding students said they drink alcoholic beverages at least monthly, and 1.6 percent said they use marijuana regularly. Less than one percent admitted to using cocaine, crack, amphetamines or other drugs on a regular basis.

— 17 percent admitted to having stolen something from a store in the past five years; 78 percent said they had cheated in school.

"This year's survey offers ample evidence that parents' work is far from done, even when their kids' report cards are suitable for framing," said Paul Krouse, publisher of Who's Who Among American High School Students.

Michael Cho, a senior at Jesuit College Preparatory School in Dallas, said some of his classmates talk about sex with a stranger, but the discussions are not prevalent. "They would do it for money and to be set in life," he said. "Some say they will do it if it will get me a good SAT score."

As for himself, Cho said he probably would have sex with a stranger for money, but not for a car, a good job or entrance into his first-choice college. "I'm set on my goals and I think I can achieve them on my own," he said.

New coffee shop opens its doors

Owner creates drinks that are 'unique to the Pioneer Valley'

By Matthew Pottinger
Collegian Correspondent

AMHERST — With temperatures dropping into what could be a cruel winter, Amherst coffee drinkers can take comfort in knowing that there's a new coffee shop in town where they can defrost and get their caffeine fixes.

Rao's Coffee Roasting Co. opened two weeks ago with greater success than its predecessor at the same location, the Chinese Olympic Bakery. Its owner, Scott Rao, has been pleased with the turn out so far.

"It did well right away, it's been great," he said.

Rao said he hopes his emphasis on a wide variety of specialty coffee drinks, and on the coffee roasting process, will be the hitch attracting his customers.

"Most people who sell coffee aren't focussing on the coffee, they're selling other things, like bakeries. Hopefully it'll show that I'm caring about coffee; that it's the focus," he said.

The coffee shop houses its own coffee roasting machine, which Rao hopes to have running this week. Coffee beans roasted by the machine will be used to brew all of the shop's coffee, and will also be available to customers by the pound.

On a shelf near a register are books full of photographs depicting the entire coffee picking process. Rao said he ships in 140-pound-bags of the little grey beans, stripped of the cherry-like pod they grow in.

The machine will then be used to roast the inedible little kernels into the familiar brown nuggets that may be brewed into coffee.

Rao described the roasting process as being "a lot like popcorn."

"Basically, you have the little corn kernels before you put them in the air popper, they're really small and you don't want to eat them," Rao said. "Same thing with coffee. You don't want to eat these, you can't do anything with them. You can't make coffee with them. The machine is kind of like an oven. It cooks the beans, and much like popcorn, it pops it's skin and it grows.

"My job is to control the temperature and make sure that nothing bad is happening, like burning, and to stop it when I think that the coffee is going to taste good," he said.

Rao imports his beans from a variety of places, ranging from Costa Rica to Antigua.

"The taste of coffee is determined by the type of bean you use and the roaster, so it's really crucial. If you want you're coffee to taste good, you really want to be able to roast it in a certain range."

Rao, an enthusiastic man, was originally from New York, and moved to California where he managed several coffee houses before going to work for a roaster in Los Angeles, where he learned his trade.

When Rao moved back to the East Coast, he said he was disappointed in what was available in terms of coffee.

"I'm from the West Coast and coffee is a little ahead of here. It's a little more popular," he said. "And they're a little pickier out there about what they're drinking."

Rao said he hopes that any disadvantage in being located in a space removed from Amherst's main drag, North Pleasant Street, will be balanced out by frequently returning customers.

"Certainly being located on North Pleasant Street would help, as far as traffic and visibility go, but we've been having a lot of specials to get people to try us out, and people are really coming back," he said. "Most of our customers are daily so far. Students come every night. We're not on the main street, but as long as people come and try us out, that's all we need."

"It's a lot better than other places on the main drag," said Nancy, an Amherst resident. She said she enjoys the fact that the shop is not located next to a bus stop.

With the intermittent help of an espresso machine, Rao creates a variety of specialty drinks unique to the Pioneer Valley, including "hot vanilla" (the alter ego of hot chocolate), vanilla ole, and a cafe mocha ice-smoothie.

Emily Lamstein, a senior English major, said she thought the prices were average, "But I think it's worth it."

As for stuff to eat, the coffee shop offers a small assortment of pastries and muffins, and bagels from New York.

"We give free refills on coffee, which is unique, and students appreciate it when they're studying," Rao said.

The shop, which is open until midnight on weekdays, and 1:00 a.m. on Fridays and Saturdays, is reported to get fairly busy on the weekend.

"I come here to study usually; the library is stuffy, you know," said University of Massachusetts English student Wendy DeBettencourt. "It is so clean and nice, it's really comfortable. It's the best coffee shop I've been to, [and] I've been to many."

"I think it's a good study environment. I think most of the coffee houses in Amherst are pretty dim," said Anne Balasa, a UMass senior philosophy major.

"The second half of the day it's mostly students and the first half of the day it's mostly townspeople," Rao said. But students and Amherst residents alike are there for the fuel that keeps them running.

"We're a coffee house. We have students come and study, we have people in the morning for the coffee to go, we have a little entertainment. But mostly I really want to roast coffee and do it well," Rao said.

Television brings harsh reality home

"Pedro died," my housemate said, staring at me with a look of bewilderment.

"What?" I asked.

"Pedro, from 'The Real World,' he died on Friday," she repeated in the same monotone.

"He did?" I responded. She nodded her head, looking at me as if searching for some sort of comprehension for her own feelings. "Wow."

I said. We both stood in the kitchen, lost in a silence that seemed to scream and swirl like flying banshees around the track lighting. I didn't know what to say.

"Wow," I repeated, still searching for the words to express some sort of intelligible sentiment — but lacking any grasp on what to feel. My head to the ground, I walked back into my room, still lost in a sea of comprehension.

I didn't know what to think. Having watched the MTV series pretty regularly, I felt as if I had somehow lost one of my own friends. But it all felt really strange. This was someone from a TV series — but he wasn't a fictional character, he was real. And his battle with the AIDS virus was not a tragedy created by a TV writer, it was a harsh reality that we all need to deal with in some form or another.

For once the Television mirrored reality — uncensored, untouched, a naked truth coming out in full force through thousands of pixels. Pedro brought AIDS awareness into X- generationers' living rooms with a sincerity and honesty that actors wouldn't have been able to achieve. His fight wasn't exploited, or overdramatic, because it wasn't taken from a script. We knew Pedro's battle wasn't part of a cliffhanger, the battle would end when the virus won, and with still no cure, we knew it inevitably would.

E.C. Thomas

When the producers of MTV's "The Real World" chose Pedro Zamora to take part in the show, they took a risk that many would find him "too real" to watch. The fact that he was both gay and had AIDS was a double-edged sword, and one that is not the easiest of issues for Americans to understand, let alone accept. To ask them to watch this life, uncensored was pretty audacious.

While this could have become either a ratings game or some sort of cheap, self-righteous, exploitive lesson for the masses, instead "The Real World" and Pedro stood on their own. The 22-year-old challenged us to rethink our beliefs about living with AIDS. By sharing with us the issues he was faced with, we were given a more humanistic understanding of the courage and strength an individual living with AIDS must have.

It is to Pedro's credit that he risked putting his "controversial" life and lifestyle out into an arena that might not welcome him. The fact that the series wasn't filmed for the sole purpose of eliciting viewer compassion, or understanding regarding AIDS, made Pedro an even greater reality, but also left him in a greater state of vulnerability. Afterall this was everyday life, and AIDS and the prejudices we have against those living with AIDS is a part of everyday reality.

Pedro gave the statistical far-away-from-us issue a face, and he did it with pride and dignity. It's too easy to remove yourself from the pixels and say it can't happen to me. And when you watch a documentary that focuses on living with AIDS, it seems to be taken out of the everyday reality we are so accustomed to. Pedro's life, painted across the back drop of his castmates', placed AIDS where it will always be, cure or not — as a part of our own everyday real world. The fact that reality was brought to us through those thousands of pixels doesn't mean we can kick away by changing the channel.

Returning to the good ol' days

Next Thursday is a holiday with very special meaning to college students everywhere. Succumbing to the allure of turkey, mashed potatoes and pumpkin pie, students from all over the country return to their hometowns for a home-cooked meal, some dysfunctional family fun, and of course, their high school's football game.

At these games friendships are renewed, phone numbers are exchanged, and most students are reminded why they decided to get the hell away from these people in the first place.

This Thanksgiving is an extra special one for Yours Truly. Beyond watching my alma mater extend its record to a perfect 9-11, this year's break will feature the happy occasion of my five-year high school reunion.

As the years have passed, I've watched my older friends lament the fact that five years had passed since they last graced the hallowed halls of CRHS, but I thought my turn would never come. Reunions seemed like something old people do, like getting married or bringing wine to a dinner party. Now I'm just over a week away from my big night and I think I'd rather pass a kidney stone.

Hundreds of kids, whom I'd rather than eat a public school hot dog in the presence of, and whom I once would have dined with 1Lanibal Lecter, will soon appear to me in the new form of job-holding, acne-less twentysomethings. Armed with nothing more formidable than a cocktail wienie, I'm expected to maneuver through a minefield of newly labeled Generation X-ers that will most surely include several Ivy League graduates, war heroes and at least one or two folks with some sort of direction in life. I, meanwhile, will boast of my forthcoming UMass degree.

This being a five-year reunion, in all probability our starting quarterback will not be fat and balding. Craig Berry will be asked all about this year's Minutemen basketball team and the preseason ranking. The most beautiful girl in the school will likely be the most beautiful woman at the reunion, and the valedictorian will probably be fresh off his record-setting Jeopardy! performance.

For those of us with only slightly lesser beauty, brains, and athleticism however, the evening promises to be as tense as the night before one undergoes a root canal.

When I arrive in my not-so-new Honda, I expect my brakes to squeal louder than they normally do as I squeeze into a space between a black Lexus and a red BMW. As I reply "still at UMass," to each and every question of what I'm doing with my life, I expect the chuckles of superiority to come not only from my classmates who breezed through Stanford in three years, but also from those who bypassed college and the tens of thousands of tuition dollars and found their fortunes anyway.

There is one thing that has changed about each and every one of my former classmates in the past five years. This one thing will serve as the buffer between the majority of us and the most nightmarish experience of our lives. Each and every one of us has experienced a milestone during this time-each one of us has passed the legal drinking age of 21.

Each Budweiser, each rum & Coke, each and every gin & tonic that is consumed that night will make the good ol' days seem better and better. By the end of the night, everyone will be convinced that high school really was the best time of their lives.

The next morning most of us will wake up with a hangover and a handful of phone numbers we'll never use. Like we did after graduation, we'll thank God it's over.

Prop 187 leads to rage of races

"Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free. The wretched refuse of your teeming shore. Send these, the homeless, tempt-tost, to me, I lift my lamp beside the golden door." This is at the base of the Statue of Liberty in New York next to Ellis Island and the national immigrant museum.

I feel it should read more like: Give me your poor let me make them tired, I will huddle them in masses to pick our produce and make them breathe pesticides, and dream of being free, the wretched refuse of your teeming shores (except Haitians, Dominicans, and certain Cubans). Send these, they will be homeless, and tossed about, I lift my lamp besides the golden door (which we stole from our ancestors).

On Nov. 8 the state of California enacted a referendum (187) that would discontinue any type of basic service to the sons and daughters of illegal aliens. I find this repulsive. I have witnessed the sending back and relocating of Haitian boat people fleeing a ruthless government that is the product of U.S. policy in Haiti for the past 40 years.

I have also witnessed the establishment of "concentration" style camp holdings of Cuban people (and Haitians) for fleeing a poverty stricken homeland that is the direct result of the U.S. embargo on Cuba. Now after implementing NAFTA, the United States would like to block off the border to Mexico. I would not be upset with this if big business was dealt with in the same manner, because if you think we spend lots of money on educating and nursing young Mexican-American children (citizen status undebatable), you do not want to know how much we waste on subsidies to big business.

A little history: WE TOOK THE LAND FROM MEXICO! Some people did not have any choice in becoming U.S. citizens. This land was conquered. I may not get too much understanding for that statement in light of some imperialist sentiments, but it is crucial to know that [the United States] has contributed to the plight of Mexicans. I wonder if our citizens think that because the Statue of Liberty is in the North Atlantic, that the message on it was only for Europeans.

I feel it should read more like: "Give me your poor let me make them tired, I will huddle them in masses to pick our produce and make them breathe pesticides, and dream of being free, the wretched refuse of your teeming shores (except Haitians, Dominicans, and certain Cubans). Send these, they will be homeless, and tossed about, I lift my lamp besides the golden door (which we stole from our ancestors)."

Daniel Rivera

Now that immigrants aren't from Europe our European-American brothers and sisters on the right (or in the fright), would like for us to shut our doors to the new wave of Immigrants; because they look nothing like them, and because they speak a language they do not understand, or even worse; they may take jobs. My fellow citizens, the "Browning of America" is inevitable, and a part of our destiny as a nation!

If as citizens we are ready to draw up ethnic and racial lines and turn our backs on the products of our discourse, are we also prepared to deal with the consequences of that (i.e. look at Bosnia)? And when that happens, (because it will, if we continue to build up the rage of the races) where will you stand and how will you react? I know where I will be! And don't be surprised if Lady Liberty is missing her light, and no one can find her golden door!

Just your typical waiting room

Last in Health Services, applying pressure to my newest battle wound, a neat incision on the tip of my third finger of my left hand. "I hate waiting rooms," I thought to myself. I wished I hadn't cut that bagel with the steak knife this morning.

Damn.

It was a tiny incident in the whole scheme of things, but I still searched for the reasons I was sitting there.

I felt foolish, missing an exam that would inevitably return to sink my drowning mind, which was already overloaded with conflicting feelings of contentment and malaise.

"I need to stop this mental rambling," I said to myself. "I need to get a grip. I should read a magazine."

My choices were limited. There was a Ranger Rick, the March 1992 issue. The Cocci frog was on the cover. Under that lurked Health and Science. I felt like I was flicking the channels while vegetating on the couch.

David Jastrow

I found an old Issue of People. It had a picture of Jon Bon Jovi and Richie Sambora, and they were hanging out with Heather Locklear. I smiled. Ah, the return of Bon Jovi. There was also Women's Day. I experienced a flashback to when I was around 8-years-old, looking rapidly through the pages of my mother's women's magazines, searching for an article about sex. They were always kind of cool.

I was perusing the recipe page when I was called in by one of the nurses. Caught halfway in my flash-back, I subtly tossed the magazine on the wooden coffee table that was the same color as every coffee table in every waiting room in America.

The nurse immediatly recognized the wound as a classic bagel injury. I sat there holding my finger in the mysterious brown liquid she offered to me.

Suddenly, I began to rationalize that I was engaging in a Jewish cultural tradition. I wondered if nearly every Jewish person had or would someday acquire a small wound on the tip of their third figners. Just as all males get circumcised, perhaps this was simply another right of passage.

Maybe after graduation, I will design my own waiting room. Instead of conveying an atmosphere of sterility and gloominess, it will temporarily ease the minds of restless friends and family.

It will have a plethora of good novels and periodicals, some cool posters, maybe a black light. There could be a drink dispenser that offers wheat grass juice like they have at the Raw Carrot. I could clean up a few internal organs while I am waiting.

There would be a soft drink dispenser with RC Cola and small paper cups with crushed Ice. Maybe an "I Station" like they have in music stores to check out some new CDs for a while.

I walked out of the building, took a deep breath of non- medicated air, and destroyed the menacing yellow parking ticket that was neatly tucked under my windshield wiper.

It was another day.

Nation's leader speaks to students

To the editor:

Hillary and I are deeply saddened by the news of the death of Pedro Zamora.

In his short life, Pedro educated and enlightened our nation. He taught all of us that AIDS is a disease with a human face and one that affects every American, indeed every citizen of the world. And he taught people living with AIDS how to fight for their rights and live with dignity.

Pedro was particularly instrumental in reaching out to his own generation, where AIDS is striking hard. Through his work with MTV, he taught young people that "The Real World" includes AIDS and that each of us has the responsibility to protect ourselves and our loved ones.

Today, one in four new HIV infections is among people under the age of 20. For Pedro, and for all Americans infected and affected by HIV, we must intensify our efforts to reduce the rate of HIV infection, provide treatment to those living with AIDS, and, ultimately, find a cure for AIDS.

Our hearts are with Pedro's family in this difficult time. In the months ahead, let us rededicate ourselves to continuing Pedro's brave fight.

Psych course offers a new perspective

Looking through the UMass course catalog last semester, what image came to mind when you saw Psychology 390C: The Lesbian Experience? A room full of dykes? Probably.

That's what came to our minds when we, two heterosexual women, signed up for the class. We registered partly out of curiosity and partly out of a need to understand a rarely exposed facet of women. We entered with open minds.

As it turned out, The Lesbian Experience is not a room full of dykes preaching gay pride and straight-bashing. No strange sexual acts are performed. This is not a "singles" class for picking up other women.

This class is actually comprised of a mix of students: heterosexuals, bisexuals, lesbians, and gay men. All have come together to explore sexuality and stereotypes and to learn about lesbians' long struggle for equal rights and acceptance.

Taking a "heterosexual perspective," we are trying to give you a look at the lesbian community. We felt that reading lesbians' views on lesbians left out an entire population of curious heterosexuals out there. Not everyone has the guts or the freedom to risk actually going to a class on it. (I mean, what to you tell Grandpa when he asks what courses you are taking?) But we think there are a lot of people who either question their own sexuality or just have an itching curiosity about "the other side."

Carrie Riccio & Amanda Willius

From day one, our class has been an open forum. Our professor Bonnie Strickland ties together a flow of ideas with published works, historical accounts, and personal experiences . . . and both gays and straights have equal say.

The initial weeks were interesting, to say the least. One incident that sticks out is when the professor wrote "lesbian" on one side of the board and "heterosexual female" on the other side.

The class was asked to yell out what words came to mind when we read each word on the board. Dyke, butch and strange came up for the "lesbian" side. Most of these words came from the lesbians themselves.

It was their response to "heterosexual female" that really struck us, however. Narrow-minded. Boring. Weak. Oh, and to top it off: hairsprayed hair and long fingernails. We suddenly saw ourselves as naive heterosexual women.

This was a landmark in our understanding of "the other." Why did they think those things about us? Why do people think such awful things about lesbians? Why do any of us have stereotypes?

We have been learning, watching, reading and listening to what it takes to be an "out of the closet" lesbian in this conservative society. The challenges often seem endless. Doors often seem closed.

We heterosexuals now believe it to be a brave and powerful struggle to kick these doors open, which is perhaps why heterosexuals look weak compared to this. There are a lot of things that heterosexuals do without even thinking about it, that lesbians risk their lives for every day.

In questioning stereotypes and learning lesbian history, we found that our minds and hearts had been opened to new ideas, perspectives, and ways of life.

The Lesbian Experience. Yes, Grandpa, The Lesbian Experience. We all have a lot to learn about each other.

Carrie Riccio and Amanda Willius are UMass students.

Republican stronghold could lead to scrapped programs

In our recent elections, the Republican Party gained majorities in both the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives. Republican candidates in races across the nation, such as surprise New York gubernatorial winner George Pataki, appealed to voters fears regarding crime, welfare reform, abortion rights and other social policies. Secure in office for the next two to four years, the Republicans are in position to have the majority of input on future legislation.

Regarding crime policy, Governor Pataki of New York is an example of how strong pro-death-penalty, pro-prison sentiments are throughout America, particularly near our major urban centers. With their focus on criminal punishment rather than rehabilitation, the G.O.P. will likely achieve higher prison populations, comprised mostly of lower-class male prisoners. As these prisoners remain incarcerated, their dependents will be suffering doubly, unprovided for and unable to collect any social assistance.

Thomas Akyali

House Speaker Newt Gingrich, a Republican from Georgia, has declared the G.O.P.'s war on social programs. While the need for welfare reform is glaring, Gingrich's call for an end to aid for all able-bodied recipients is somewhat extreme. By Gingrich's plan, such able-bodied recipients would be forced to solicit private charitable donations to keep them fed and clothed. What such policy fails to address is the government's responsibility in job creation, or lack thereof. The key to welfare reform is effective job training, to prepare recipients for the jobs that are available.

Furthermore, the Republican idea that cutting off aid to single teenage mothers will encourage teenage parents to marry is dangerously misguided. Such cuts in aid, combined with expected Republican cuts in programs such as Head Start, will serve only to perpetuate the educational problems plaguing our lower classes. The immediate result will be a marked decrease in the living standard of single mothers and their children. More importantly, the cuts will lead to a future rise in the number of poor and unemployed, as the children of these women receive little or no education during their formative years.

As they get ready to cut off aid to single teenage mothers, the G.O.P. has announced plans to cut off federal abortion funding, as well as plans to reenact the archaic "gag rule" preventing staff at federally funded clinics from discussing the possibility of abortion with patients. Thus a poor or unemployed single woman, even in cases of rape and incest, is condemned from the moment she realizes her pregnancy. Unable to afford an abortion, she gives birth to a child for whom she can provide neither a stable home nor a basic education. The same government that denied her access to an abortion now turns it's back on her, condemning her pregnancy as socially irresponsible.

Abortion access is essential to the futures of such woman as it may enable them to pursue education and employment goals without the burden of motherhood. Also, abortion prevents the birth of unwanted babies into desperate financial situations, where the family unit does not exist and they have no access to proper medical care.

In order to prevent the birth of children into what Newt Gingrich himself has termed a "perpetual underclass," we must allow women the option of terminating unwanted pregnancies. It is more economically feasible to provide educational opportunities to these women before they have children, thus allowing them to provide, unaided, for their future families.

The key to eliminating poverty in America is not cutting off aid to welfare recipients. A life on welfare is not a life of luxury, and those on welfare would surely take any available jobs that they are qualified for. The key to decreasing welfare dependency lies in the creation of effective job training and education programs.

With a small investment over a finite period of time, the Government can give welfare recipients the skills needed to find jobs and become financially independent. Furthermore, the children of these ex-welfare recipients will grow up exposed to quality health care, more stable home environments, and most importantly, better education. Thus these children will be able to find jobs on their own. Only then will the history of welfare dependency in these families, and across America, come to an end.

Falling into the usual semester rut

Every once and again, there comes a time when I find that I have slipped into a lethargic rut. I have let myself fall into a standstill.

I do my best to avoid complaining because I do not believe that anyone wants to listen to others' problems. However, I do believe that many people go through the same thing.

It seems that when something bad happens, if it is not addressed and dealt with, I become more vulnerable to setbacks which only escalate my anxiety and negative sentiment.

Maintaining my composure by remaining at an even keel, and internally keeping it down, is not easy. It builds to the extent that minor and insignificant instances become bigger than they actually are and should be.

I can tell there is something wrong while walking around campus. I had or know that I can have decent conversation. Although, during the past couple of weeks, I have found myself tongue-tied and at a loss for words when I am sure I have something, anything worthwhile to say.

I can tell there is something wrong while walking around campus. I bump into people with whom I have had or know that I can have decent conversation. Although, during the past couple of weeks, I have found myself tongue–tied and at a loss for words when I am sure I have something, anything worthwhile to say.

Henry Brier

What brings on such lethargy?

As a college student, academics undoubtedly play a role. When falling behind in one subject, it is easy to become even more lazy and ignore yet another subject.

When finances and expenses are figured in, the equation becomes even more complex. Bills need to be paid, so I need to work, but then studying is neglected.

About one week ago, it all came to a point. Three weeks– worth of dirty laundry had piled up, as did my backlog of schoolwork. It seems that these two entities have always been closely correlated, almost as if they conspire to wear me thin and take me down.

I saved my paychecks and covered my bills. One obstacle temporarily conquered; until another round of charges rolls in next month.

I cut right to academics by taking care of papers and studying that which I had ignored. It was not simple, but the lingering push had become a demanding shove. Another problem had been effectively eradicated.

I threw all of my dirty clothes into a duffel, brought the bag to the laundromat, cleaned, softened and dried everything. I then returned home after having tamed another pressing issue.

Before I began tackling that which was irritating me, I was going through some trying times. I am now on the upswing, thanks to the emergence of some truly genuine individuals whose names merit citation.

Last weekend, a friend came over for dinner. Not only did he listen to me complain for a few hours, but also we walked around outside. It was a chilly and crisp night, yet each breath proved to be relaxing.

Just the other day, another friend helped me to study more effectively. He had taken the same course which was giving me trouble, and he assisted by streamlining my technique.

Earlier this week, I was sitting on a couch in the Campus Center and doing nothing in particular but watching people and the world go by. A woman whom I spoke with more often last semester saddled over and sat down next to me. She gave me her ear and I nearly chewed it off. Additionally, she offered worthy advice which was certainly well-heeded.

This story's moral is that hope lies in different places. Some is easy to find, while other finds you. There is a way out, but everyone needs to understand their most beneficial method.

Letters to the Editor

Elections make things normal

To the editor:

As a campus radical, many have come to me to comment on the results of the elections. The liberal friends I have expect me to commiserate with them. What unites the two middles of the political spectrum is the sense of completion and catharsis that follow elections. The sense that the grand passion play is over, and now we return to the regularly scheduled programming.

That Is of course, the main point of elections. To function as a safety mechanism for political passions, and as a grand advertising scheme for THE SYSTEM. You may never get a chance to directly affect the social issues of your life. Go ahead and try to vote for decent affordable housing, a job environment free of racism, sexism and homophobia, or even something as simple as full time jobs for your community. You can't. And in a halfway decent political system, you wouldn't even have to vote for it, it would already be the case.

The reason THE SYSTEM needs an advertising campaign is to impress upon us a certain narrowness of vision that is essential for capitalism to survive. Leftists recognize that this country is a relatively free country. So what is it that enables a very small minority of wealthy individuals and corporations to rule this country? The answer, and this derives in part from a man named Antonio Gramsci, is that the ruling class uses its domination of the media and cultural environment to limit the choices that the average citizen will see as rational.

While the USSR has faded away as a military threat, Republicans are calling for increasing military budget. Even though millions are economically insecure, politicians want to cut back social spending. Even though racism is alive and well, the ruling party now wants to eliminate civil rights laws.

dada promises rock tunes with a few bizarre edges

COURTESY DENNIS KELLEY

Dada is set to play Pearl Street Thursday evening.

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

Thursday night is sure to rocking with a blend of ordinary rock and unusual twists when the Los Angeles based trio dada will take the stage at Pearl Street.

The band, comprised of guitarist/vocalist Joie Calio, bassist/vocalist Michael Gurley and drummer/vocalist Phil Leavitt, has achieved success in the past few years with a unique blend of straightforward rock, mixed with various different twists, and a tendency for bizarre lyrics.

'Puzzle' drew critical acclaim worldwide for its finely crafted guitar work and 'open jamming' style.

The band formed in 1990 in L.A. after the previous band Calio and Gurley were in, Louis and Clark, broke up and the two acquired Leavitt from the L.A. band Darlus. After gigging for a while in local clubs, the band caught the attention of I.R.S. records, the label that started such legendary bands as The Police and R.E.M. The trio then recorded their debut, Puzzle.

The album drew critical acclaim worldwide for its finely crafted guitar work and "open jamming" style and allowed for a successful 18 month run. While many of these shows were used as headliners, the band also appeared as an opening act for acts as Sting, Crowded House, Material Issue, Izzy Stadlin and Mary's Danish.

With MTV's support of the song "Dizz Knee Land" and strong radio support of "Here Today, Gone Tomorrow," and "Dim," Puzzle went on to sell 300,000 copies in the United States alone.

Their sophomore effort, American Highway Flower, continues with more of the same pop crafting that made Puzzle a hit. Co-produced by Jason Corsaro, who has worked with a diverse array of artists including Madonna, Ron Wood, PIL and most recently on Soundgarden's Superunknown, the album is already gaining critical support.

Dada is a band that displays many of the elements that should be inherent in rock music, like quick tempos, catchy riffs and solos worthy of your best air guitar. They mix these elements, however, with highly layered song structures and curious, unconvensional lyrics to create a sound that will rock, and never bore you.

Dada will play at Pearl Street, Northampton on Nov. 17. The show is 18+. Tickets are available at For The Record, Strawberries. Tix Unlimited and the Northampton Box Office.

UPC to host 'Best of the Underground'

When the genre of hip-hop emerged from the streets back in the early to mid 1980s, the possibility of this urban style of music and the mainstream walking hand-in-hand seemed somewhat far-fetched.

But now with the success of such artists as Dr. Dre, Ice Cube, and Snoop Doggy Dogg, rap has officially crawled out from the depths and joined the ranks of the popular music. Unbeknownst to some though, there is still a vibrant an artistically challenging underground in the rap world.

On Nov. 17 the University Productions and Concerts in conjunction with the UMass Arts Council will sponsor "The Best of the Underground," a showcase of five up and coming hip-hop acts that are slowly but surely making a name for themselves.

All five of the acts, which include The Beatnuts, Arrifacts, Organized Konfusion, Gravediggaz and Common Sense, are mixing old-school aesthetics with nineties concepts and in the process taking hip-hop to a whole new level.

"The Best of the Underground" is a rare opportunity to be exposed to some of the most aspiring sounds in rap before they move on to the media spotlight.

"The Best of the Underground" will perform Nov. 17 in the Student Union Ballroom at 8:00 p.m. Tickets are $10/UM I.D. and $12/general public. Tickets are available at Strawberries, For The Record, and Tix Unlimited.

Steel Pulse entertains with an eclectic blend of reggae

By David Gleeson
Collegian Staff

Northampton got a dose of reggae fever on Monday night when Steel Pulse brought their roots message to Pearl Street during an electrifying set of new and old matcrial.

Lead singer/songwriter David Hinds, with his head full of thick dreadlock mates, opened by burning into the night with "Ravers" from the album True Democracy. The band of reggae veterans provided a musical sensation to accompany Hinds thick wailing voice and lyrical message.

The small crowd that was lucky enough to attend the intimate show were kept smiling and dancing as the band jammed music from throughout their history.

Steel Pulse also played a number of songs from their tenth and newest album Vex, including the song "Back To My Roots," in which Hinds pledges a return to "serve the sufferer's from this day on."

Steel Pulse then played a barrage of old favorites as they kept the crowd dancing late into the night. They played "Taxi Driver" after proclaiming their ongoing lawsuit with the New York City's Taxi and Limousine Commission for cabbies not stopping to pick up Blacks.

Pulse also belted out old grooves like "Sound System," and asked the crowd to "blow away your bluesy feeling" when they played "Chant a Psalm."

Throughout the night they played a blend of songs from their various style in roots reggae, dancehall, and from the quick beat blasting songs to slow smooth grooves.

A high point in the show was when they closed the first set with an energized version of "Stepping Out" with loud horns, and a rejuvenated crowd.

Any reserve energy would be needed for their encore performance though, as they went into another long set of music including one of their funkier dance songs "Roller Skates."

As a grand finale, they each performed solo jams during a flag waving performance of "Worrih' His Weight In Gold (Rally Round)" that had the band dancing on stage, rallying around the red, gold, black, and green of their flag. A+

'Scarlett' sequel blows like the wind

By Tara MK Connelly

SCARLETT
with Joanne Whaley-Kilmer
& Timothy Dalton
CBS

When Margaret Mitchell penned the famous epic novel Gone With the Wind, one can almost justify Alexandra Ripley's Scarlett. After all, who wasn't curious to see if tomorrow would be another day for a feisty Scarlett O'Hara?

In fact, no matter how loyal GWTW fans were, it was the curiosity factor that made Scarlett big, that compelled them to buy the book, and read every page even if it was to disagree and point fingers. In all fairness, Ripley tried her best to capture the essence of Mitchell's characters. But taking Scarlett away to Ireland wasn't the way to go.

So now with the mini-series Scarlett on CBS, fans are once again faced with the dilemma— to view or not to view. A sequel novel was one thing, a mini-series is a whole other ball game. Readers could visualize the temptress Scarlett in the sequel book because the movie provided them with the face of Vivien Leigh. As far-fetched as the plot went, it was a satisfactory fairy tale ending to a book that wasn't meant to be a fairy-tale.

Not so with a mini-series (on television none the less). Who the hell could play Scarlett but Vivian Leigh? It is impossible to visualize Scarlett with any other face as she is immortalized as Vivian Leigh. Joanne Whaley-Kilmer (Trial By Jury) is a good actress, but not as Scarlett. In fact, Timothy Dalton is hard to see as a dashing Rhett Butler, but he has the flare and panache as the ex-007 that helps a bit.

People will watch "Scarlett" for a few reasons — to be disappointed, and to satisfy the curiosity and to answer the what ifs. I wanted to see Rhett and Scarlett back together again more than anything, but it was the fact that I would "never know" that made me love the book and the movie.

The first night left many viewers breathless with anticipation, including this one, but that anticipation wore off as soon as I saw the characters. Who was that dashing guy with the rippling muscles and reckless air? No It wasn't Rhett — it was Ashley. Where was the milk sop husband and who was the ruffian drinking alcohol like a man born to the bottle and not a forlorn Southern gentleman? And Rhett! How can anyone still say Rhett Butler is the sexist man on screen when we get to see him being cleaned (quite thoroughly) by a cheap rendition of Belle Watlin. What is dashing about watching a whore clean in between someone's toes?!

Maybe the problem with the cast is that we have already associated them with other characters before "Scarlett." Whereas the original cast mrmbers were famous in their own right, the still seemed to slip into the GWTW characters without missing a beat.

To give CBS and "Scarlett" producers their due, a lot of time was set up to recreate the time period. Costumes were painstakingly agonized over, and the world scoured to find the next Vivian Leigh. But there isn't ever going to be another Vivian Leigh or a Clark Gable. That's what makes the mini-series awful. And it is also why so many viewers are going to be disappointed when they realize how awful the substitution for the real thing is.

Joshua Bell joins Houston Symphony for FAC performance

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

In the high speed, over-intensive college climate that students find themselves immersed in every day, they tend to gaze blindly at what lies directly ahead of them. Following the "tip of your nose" is a syndrome that we all fall into, and the loss of a historically based mindset, personal and societal, effects us all.

On Nov. 19 a piece of American classical music history will grace the Five College area with its interpretations of new and old compositions. The 98-member Houston Symphony Orchestra will perform this Saturday night at 7:30 p.m. at the Fine Arts Concert Hall, with special guest violinist Joshua Bell.

The repertoire of the evening's program includes Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E Minor, op. 64, Prokofiev's Symphony No.5, op. 100 and Prelude for Orchestra by Bright Sheng. A survivor of Mao Zedong's Cultural Revolution,

Sweet Baby James Taylor eases into Mullins Center

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

A "walking man" is returning home to his native Massachusetts when James Taylor plays the Mullins Center tonight at 7:30 p.m.

UMass is one of Taylor's last three stops on the tour that started in June and has ranged over the United States and Canada. Taylor also played at Tanglewood and Great Woods earlier on the tour.

Taylor was born in Boston, Mass. He was the second born into what was to become a musical family, including brothers Alex, Livingston, Hugh, and sister Kate.

The first hint of Taylor's future success would come on Martha's Vineyard in the summer of 1963 when he won a local "hootenanny" contest with guitarist Danny "Kootch" Kortchmar.

In November of 1968, Taylor was the first "outside" act ever signed to the Beatles' label, Apple Records. His first album was released in the United Kingdom, and shortly after his hit single, "Carolina on my Mind" was released.

Taylor's career was slowed soon after when he broke both hands in a motorcycle accident and was unable to play for several months. He rebounded, however, by signing with Warner Brothers records in late 1969, where he began production on his Sweet Baby James album, which became platinum six months later.

Since then, Taylor has released more than 12 albums, and gone on tour with such stars as Carly Simon and Linda Ronstadt, and performed with Paul Simon and Art Garfunkel.

His greatest hits album, released by Warner Brothers in November of 1976, included such hit songs as "Sweet Baby James," "Fire and Rain" and "You've got a Friend."

Taylor won Best Pop Vocal Performance, Male at the grammy awards for "You've Got a Friend" in 1972, and later won the same award in 1978 for "Handyman."

Taylor's last studio album, New Moon Shine was released on Oct. 1 of 1991, with "Copperline" being the first single.

Taylor spent the latter half of 1992 touring first through Europe and then the United States, with four sold out nights at Great Woods. Part of this tour was used for the double- CD live album Columbia records released in August of 1993. The album has already gone platinum in the United States.

This current tour, his first large-scale tour since 1992, comes as Columbia released a one CD/cassette version of the Live album released in 1993, entitled James Taylor (Best Live). It contains such songs as "Fire & Rain," "How Sweet It Is" and "Mexico."

After tonight's show, Taylor will be playing in Syracuse, NY. and then in Montreal, Quebec, and ends his tour on Nov. 20 in California.

Taylor's tour will support the National Resource Defense Council, an environmental action organization that has been working for more than 25 years to reduce pollution and protect human health. Taylor is supporting their multi-year campaign to protect the nation's water supply.

James Taylor will play the Mullins Center at 7:30 p.m. tonight. Call 545-0505 for ticket information.

Sheng brings both his native northwestern Chinese culture and his Brahmsian-style of influence into this special piece that will be presented by the orchestra.

Established in 1913, the Houston Symphony Orchestra celebrated its 80th anniversary with their 1993-94 touring season, and hopes to continue the tradition of bringing to the world, not just the United States, the genre of international and American classical works. From the 1990 Singapore Festival of Arts and the 1991 Pacific Music Festival in Japan, to their tour of Germany, Switzerland and Austria in the winter of 1992, the last few years have brought many miles, and many exclamations of acclaim, to this homebred organization.

Like many top performers in any style of business, the beginnings of Joshua Bell's career began at an early age. By age 12, he studied with the heavily acclaimed Josef Gingold, and by age 14 he had a guest performance with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Not a bad setting for a solid base to start from, it only continued with his subsequent live performances in all four corners of the world. The major concert halls of New York, London, Milan and Tokyo led to television appearances on PBS' "Live From The Lincoln Center" for the Bloomington, Indiana native.

Under the direction of renowned conductor and concert pianist Christoph Eschenbach, one of America's oldest performing arts institutions will be joined on stage by one of the newest talents in Mr. Bell. The old and the new, the present day and historical precedent, will be joined on stage this Saturday night.

Tickets for the Houston Symphony concert with Joshua Bell are $33, $27 and $22, with half price tickets available for Five College students. Tickets for children age 16 and under are $10. For more information call 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS outside the local calling area. The performance is presented with support from WFCR 88.5 FM and by a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts Presenting and Commissiomng Program.

So viewers will continue to see "Scarlett" because they are tempted by the idea that the impossible is possible, that a mini-series can replace the wonder of the big screen, and that Whaley-Kilmer and Dalton can recapture the passion and all consuming love that the two characters possessed.

If anything, the mini-series is a weak attempt to complete the circle Mitchell set in motion and never meant to complete. If Scarlett was meant to be written, then she should have written it. Happy endings are all well to do, but not with Gone With the Wind.

NHL charts, the Riverhawks' Jeff Daw deserves the All-Conference slot given to BU's Jacques Joubert, recently seen only on milk cartons. A consummate two-way player, Daw was the main reason for UMass' power-play shortcomings in the league opener. He has scored seven goals in as many games, six on the power play.

The Terriers' much anticipated visit to the Mullins Center Friday can only be seen on WHUR-TV, Ch. 68 in Boston. Veteran sports talk show host Dale Arnold will handle play-by-play while 1980 Olympic miracle worker Mike Eruzione will handle color.

NESN chose a compelling contest opposite UMass-BU, as the Bobs (Kurtz and Norton) head to Orono along with Paul Pooley's PC Friars.

Alfond Arena has been a tomb for the Black and White, who have won just once there in 17 games. But in his first year, Pooley has made his club one of HE's surprises and should be commended for overhauling a once-stagnant power play.

In a 8-0 wipe out at Vermont's hands on Oct. 23, PC could not convert on any of eight power plays. Six games later, it has nailed 18 of 59 (30.5 percentage) man advantages and a league-best 15 of 41 (36.6 percentage). Brady Kramer (7-6-13), South Hadley's Chad Quenneville (6-6-12) and Jay Kenney (2-8-10) are all among the league's top eight in overall scoring.

PC winger Joe Hulbig has played well below the potential of an NHL first round draft choice. But his power-play goal to defeat Lowell 3-2 on Saturday was the first game-winning goal of his career.

This is perhaps a cruel way of saying UMass has been the league's most consistent team and the year is still young, but the Minutemen are currently the only team standing in the place they were polled by the coaches.

Here are the teams listed in order of standing and where they were picked: Maine (4), BU (1), Northeastern (2), Lowell (5), Providence (7), UNH (3), Merrimack (8), BC (6), UMass (9).

A team coached by former Bruins' tough guy Bruce Crowder has to play physical, but his Riverhawks have paid the price. They are the league's league. This is a move which may sound familiar to New York sports fans.

Two years ago, the New York Jets, who have been through a barrage of changes over the past few seasons anyway, mortgaged their future for a superstar-in-the-making, Browning Nagle. A season after Nagle struggled, he was on the next plane out of town, replaced by Boomer Esiason.

Randall Cunningham struggled. Drew Bledsoe and Rick Mirer struggled. Troy Aikman struggled.

It's only a matter of time.

Dear Diary,
Last night when I was up in my favorite tree stargazing I began to ponder my life. I realized that some of my favorite things were no longer part of the new pop culture, and that many of my best loved activities were out of style. I enjoyed Pac Man and now there is Mortal Combat II. My one Barbie was fine for all seasons, but now there is a Barbie for every month and special event. I used to think rollerskating around my neighborhood in my neon, shiny jacket with my name on the sleeve was fun, b..t now everybody has rollerblades and they can go much faster. I used to enjoy trips to the grocery store with my mom until she told me it was wrong to eat candy from the big bins. The more I sat and thought about how my interests were different than most others I remembered that I had read The Daily Collegian that morning, and I knew that it was the hip thing to do because everybody was reading it. Wow! The Daily Collegian saved me from an identity crisis! I climbed happily down from the tree.

Today when I came home I noticed Mr. Peterson was in the kitchen sink.
As soon as I spotted her she jumped out and ran away.
I looked in there and found a plate that she'd licked clean.
I looked in the other room and saw her licking her hand and rubbing her face.

Experienced frontcourt to lead UMass

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

If the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team wants to accomplish its goal of winning the Atlantic 10, it will have to rely on the experience of its frontcourt.

The Minutewomen have three top returnees in the frontcourt in juniors, Melissa Gurile and Octavia Thomas, both All-America candidates, along with sophomore Crystal Carroll.

"They are three very strong and very skilled players," said UMass coach Joanie O'Brien. "They've got to start really coming together."

The 5-foot-9 Thomas, UMass' first ever All-Atlantic 10 first team selection, will start at the small forward position. Even with her small size, she can still outplay bigger opponents. Last season Thomas set career highs in seven different categories and averaged a team-high of 16.5 points and 9.2 rebounds. She also registered 13 double-doubles.

COLLEGIAN FILE

When playing against tougher opponents, Thomas stepped up her game. Against teams that competed in the 1994 NCAA tournament, she averaged 15.3 points. In the season opener last year against 1993 NCAA Tournament runner-up Ohio State, Thomas set career highs in points (31) and rebounds (14).

This year, she will be looking to perform even better while trying to help the team win. She said she wants to get a double, in points and rebounds, each game.

Gurile, a 6-foot-3 center, has led the team in blocked shots the last two years. She averaged 14.2 points and 7.2 rebounds for the Minutewomen last season, second to Thomas in both categories. She has the school record for most points in a game (38, also a career high) which she set against Providence a year ago.

This season, Gurile would like to improve on her rebounding and be more consistent. She worked on her strength and conditioning, along with her jumpshots and post play over the summer which should help her do that.

UMass Women's Basketball 1994 Season Preview

Carroll, a 6-foot-2 power forward, is a top rebounder, but can also come out and shoot the 10-15 footer. Last year she started every game and averaged 9.6 points and 6.1 rebounds, while also being named to the Atlantic 10 All- Rookie team (with teammate Beth Kuzmeski).

Carroll, Gurile and Thomas will all have to work together if the Minutewomen want to challenge for the A-10 title.

"They have to look at each other as this is our little group and we're out there together and there are certain things we've got to do — give up no offensive rebounds, when we have the shots, we've got to take them," O'Brien said. "The three of them really are going to have to control the boards, both offensively and defensively."

Two freshmen, Tez Kraft and Kara Tudman, will also contribute to the title hunt.

Kraft, a 5-foot-10 forward from Logan, Ohio, was named to the A-10 Conference "Rookies of Influence" Team. She could spell starter Thomas at the small forward position.

"She's a very good shooter and she's got three-point range," O'Brien said. "She's picked up the offense and defense very quickly. I think she is going to give us a lot of good, good, games."

Tudman, a 6-foot-2 center/forward from Rochester, NY, will challenge Carroll and Gurile for playing time. She is very athletic, can run the floor well and has the potential to be a great shot blocker.

Sophomore forward Crystal Carroll

COLLEGIAN FILE

"She's an athlete, runs very well and jumps very well," O'Brien said. "From day one in practice to where we are today, she's come leaps and bounds."

The Minutewomen are picked to finish third in the A-10 behind George Washington and Rutgers. If the frontcourt performs at the level it is capable of, then finishing third should not be no problem.

"The two teams ahead of us [GW and Rutgers] are pretty competitive, but I think we can beat them," Carroll said. "The opportunities are there [to beat them], and if we play together like we do in practices and work with each other, we can get things accomplished."

"From what I've seen I think we can fulfill all the expectations that other people have for us," Tudman said.

"We're getting a little bit more respect," Carroll said. "We have a lot of high expectations for ourselves."

Tomorrow's paper will feature an in-depth look at the Minutewomen's backcourt.

Harper and Young emerge on top; Bledsoe airs it out

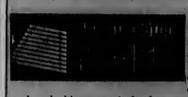
Alvin Harper and Steve Young. Two stories which came out of San Francisco's 21–14 victory over Dallas. Two stars and the extra-large shadows which have loomed over both for the past three seasons.

For Harper, the game is a turning point in his push for a lucrative contract via free agency in the off-season. His three-catch, 100-plus-yard day against the 49ers showed that he is a big-game playmaker, alongside the man by whom he is often overshadowed, Michael Irvin.

How ironic for Harper to crash Irvin's car, then use it to his advantage? Well, he did, even though it wasn't intentional.

No one expected Harper to play on Sunday, mainly because of injuries sustained not only in the collision but in the Monday night affair against the New York Giants.

He played well. Very well. Enough to be on the Monday Night Football halftime show. Dallas can ill afford to lose Harper in the off-season bidding wars. Even though this season is far from ending, Jerry Jones should make a major push to sign the jumping-jack from Wide Receiver U., or else the Cowboy offense will be minus one of its major cogs next year.



Harper wasn't alone, though when he chatted with Brent Musberger at the half of the Bills-Steelers yawner. He shared the spotlight with Young, the real star who shined on Sunday. Because of Joe Montana, Young will never be the greatest quarterback to ever wear a 49er jersey. However, his performance against the Cowboys proved that statistics do not always make a great show.

Young's ability to throw on the run jolted the Dallas defense and kept the secondary at bay all game long. The game's best defensive backfield was burned time and time again by Young's scampering; he was able to pull the safeties, Darren Woodson and James Washington, and the corners, Larry Brown and Kevin Smith, out of pass coverage and into run defense, which enabled Young to hit Jerry Rice, John Taylor and Brent Jones for deep outs.

Montana probably would not have won that game for San Francisco. He obviously doesn't have the mobility that Young has — the mobility which beat the Cowboys for the first time in four tries.

As far as winning the big game, Young finally did. But, let's not forget that a rematch looms large in the playoffs. So for Ken Norton, Jr., and Rickey Jackson, who both think they are now part of San Francisco lore, along with the likes of Montana and Rice, keep dreaming.

And Ken, take off that damn Cowboy hat.

Drew does it again . . . and again

Bledsoe drops back to pass . . . Bledsoe's out of the pocket, he's throwing to Coates . . . Drew steps back, looking over the middle, complete to Timpson . . . Bledsoe looks to the corner of the end zone, Turner for the touchdown . . .

Are you tired of it yet? Whether or not you disagree with the New England style of offense, Drew Bledsoe wins games for the Patriots and Bill Parcells. His arm is the reason he gets paid millions; so from now on, Bob Kraft has decided to get the most he can out of Bledsoe — the more throws, the more his money is getting put to use.

The complaint is that the Patriots don't have a running game — well, they don't, and Parcells will be the first to tell you that. Next year in the draft, the Pats will search for a back who fits in perfectly in the Bledsoe-led offense.

For now, though, get used to the aerial assault of Drew Bledsoe, because, basically, the Patriots have nothing else.

Coaches feeling the heat

It was only a matter of time. Coaches in the NFL are beginning to feel the heat as losses are beginning to pile up.

Houston's Jack Pardee and Kevin Gilbride were sent packing in favor of Jeff Fisher. New York's Dan Reeves has been getting little, if any, support from his pitiful Giants who have lost seven consecutive games, including listless efforts versus two division rivals, Dallas and Phoenix.

Signs of panic have already set in: Reeves benched his quarterback of the future, Dave Brown, and handed over the reins of the team to Kent Graham, an above-average back-up in the

Hockey notes: Maine first after dismal '93-94

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

Northern New England does not feature many prestigious collegiate athletic programs, but hidden beneath the heavy snowfall in Orono, Maine, there lies a fiery, vengeful, and accomplished University of Maine hockey team.

Sean Walsh's Black Bears trudged through a dismal 1993–94 campaign, the year after they celebrated a National Championship. Maine actually forged a decent record of 17–15–4, but was forced to forfeit 11 wins for using an ineligible player, forward Cal Ingraham.

Through nine games of 1994–95, Maine has not lost, posting a 6–0–3 mark, good for first place in Hockey East ahead of pre-season choice Boston University. The Black Bears have done it by taking a page from the Terriers' book, winning with defense and superb goaltending.

Maine's rearguard has done a fine job expediting goalie Blair Allison's task, yielding just 21 shots per game. Chris Imes, a 1994 U.S. Olympian, and Arlington High School graduate Dave MacIssac, have added offensive punch from the blue line as well. Imes has tallied a goal and five assists in six Hockey East games. Meanwhile MacIssac, who compiled 4–20–24 totals last year, scored to help send Friday's clash with Boston College to overtime and a subsequent shootout, where he scored again. (Maine won the shootout, 2–1.)

BU's Derek Herlofsky was named to the All-Conference squad, but Allison (6–0–3, 2.45 goals against average, .888 save percentage) and Northeastern's Mike Veisor (4–0–1, 2.62, .911) have been Hockey East's top netminders. Herlofsky has not impressed (2–1–2, 3.63, .853; 4.21, .817 in HE). BC's Greg Taylor (2–3–1, 2.66, .911) and New Hampshire's Mike Heinke (4–1–0, 2.36, .917) have also excelled between the pipes.

Heinke's numbers overall may eclipse Veisor's, but the Huskies' backup has assertively assumed the No. 1 role for UNH coach Ben Smith, particularly in conference play (2–0–1, 2.59, .914). Friday against previously unbeaten BU, the junior native of Simsbury, Conn., recorded a 3–1 victory. As they have always been for Maine, defensemen in the offensive mold were the keys for NU's upset. Senior Francois Bouchard, who netted a league-best 15 goals for a defenseman last year, paced the Huskies' offense with a goal and an assist. It was the Tampa Bay draft choice's first score of the season.

Smith's former first goalie, Todd Reynolds, showed he is still in fine form during the rematch Saturday, making 44 saves in a 4–2 setback.

As for first year puck stoppers, one might have thought the Terriers' Tom Noble would provide the stiffest competition for the University of Massachusetts' Brian Regan, for the spot on the conference's All-Rookie team. But UMass-Lowell's Scott Fankhouser debuted nicely in a losing cause to Providence Saturday, stopping 18 of 21 shots, while Noble has done little in limited playing time.

While UML's Greg Bullock may be to the HE scoring race what Mario Lemieux once was to the

Calipari responds to preseason poll

Lou Roe and the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will enter the Nov. 25 game against Arkansas with its highest ranking ever, No. 3.

By Matt Vautour

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will enter the 1994–1995 with its highest ranking ever, as the Minutemen were ranked No. 3 in the nation in the Associated Press poll that was released Monday night.

The previous high rank for UMass came on the Jan. 17 poll, when they were ranked No. 6. The Minutemen were 13–1 at the time.

They fell to No. 8 the next week after losing to DePaul.

Massachusetts Coach John Calipari was pleased with the rank but did not place any importance on it.

"We really appreciate the respect we've received from around the country," Calipari said. "We're flattered, but it really means nothing right now."

Three teams that UMass plays this season also made the poll.

The Minutemen will put their rank on the line right away as they will play No. 1 Arkansas at the Tipoff Classic in their season opener next Thursday.

It does not get any easier than that, as two of their next three games after that are against No. 11 Kansas at the John Wooden Classic in Anaheim, CA (Dec. 3) and No. 7 Maryland at College Park, Md. (Dec. 10).

With the high rank, UMass will be the favorite in most of its games. Calipari realizes every game will be huge for UMass' opponents.

"We know we're the hunted," Calipari said. "With the personality of this team, we kind of like being there. We were hunted last year so we're used to it."

UMass was the only Atlantic 10 team to make the poll. Both Temple and St. Joseph's received votes, but neither had enough to make the top 25.

The Minutemen will play their second exhibition game tomorrow night against the Turkish Junior National Team at 7 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Center.

Tax is the new buzzword in the baseball strike negotiations

By Chris Sheridan
Associated Press

Baseball owners could have made a new labor proposal to players months ago.

They discussed different strategies and came up with alternate plans.

All the while, though, they stuck with their coveted salary cap. It was a strategy that didn't work, and a strategy that will change Thursday.

The owners' new head negotiator, Red Sox chief executive officer John Harrington, says the owners will back off their salary cap proposal for the time being and make the players a new offer when talks resume in Herndon, Va., outside Washington.

"We've been discussing some alternative proposals we've had in mind for months, deciding which one to put on the table," Harrington said.

The new buzzword is "tax."

"It's not a salary cap in the strictest terms," Harrington said Monday night from his home in Massachusetts. "A tax concept can look like a salary cap, and any tax plan is meant to put some controls on labor costs.

"All payrolls would be taxed at a low percentage. All clubs would be affected above a certain level."

Harrington would not discuss proposed tax rates. Others on the management team wouldn't even comment on the shift in offers.

The union took a wait-and-see attitude.

"There's no proposal — yet," said union executive Mark Belanger.

"I wouldn't get overly optimistic about movement off the cap because there are tax programs that are worse than a salary cap and tax programs that are better," union lawyer Gene Orza said.

"It doesn't make me more pessimistic or optimistic. I just want to see it."

At the general managers' meeting in Scottsdale, Ariz., there was little reaction.

"I think at this point all we can do is continue to do our baseball business and let the people in charge there take care of that business," said Walt Jocketty, general manager of the St. Louis Cardinals. "There's nothing we can do about it."

Doug Melvin, general manager of the Texas Rangers, said, "We have to let them handle it. We just have to wait and see."

A tax plan was discussed by owners and players during informal talks in early September, back when the some thought the season could still be saved.

The players offered a plan whereby the top 16 revenue-producing clubs would pay a 1.6 percent of their income into a fund to be distributed to small-market clubs with lower revenues.

A similar tax on the top 16 payrolls also would be redistributed.

Acting commissioner Bud Selig rejected the plan Sept. 9, saying the tax rate would be insignificant.

Harrington said the owners' new offer would be different.

The details and proposed rates were still being worked out Tuesday as owners talked on conference calls in preparation for Thursday's meeting with the union and mediator W.J. Usery.

Owners will caucus with Usery on Wednesday at a hotel near Dulles Airport.

After that, both sides should "be prepared to remain in negotiations for several days if necessary," Usery said in a letter Tuesday.

The players' union expects the owners' new proposal to be complicated, and it could take a day or two for them to fully understand it.

"The players said the top 16 teams by revenue and payroll should be taxed. We feel there should be some other rationale for at what level payrolls should be taxed. These are some of the variations we are discussing," Harrington said.

"We're going to try to marry the best parts of the (revenue) tax with a general payroll tax. The players understand our main theme is to provide some collective control on labor costs."

If a new collective bargaining agreement is not reached by mid-December, the owners may choose to impose their terms on the players, which is their right under federal labor law.

If they choose to do so, as Harrington pointed out, the implemented system could be based on their original proposal containing a salary cap.

Usery is trying to mediate a settlement before then so that the two sides don't go back to the polarized positions that existed until they met for three days last week in Rye Brook, N.Y.

Tuesday was the 96th day of the strike — the longest work stoppage in baseball history.

Kerry trying to bring economic vitality to Mass. in overseas trip

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

U.S. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) is seeing the world and promoting the vitality of Massachusetts industries at the same time.

Kerry recently left for China and India on a trade mission with a delegation of more than a 12 Massachusetts companies with the hope of tapping vital overseas technology markets and generating jobs in the state.

Kerry is particularly focused on fostering the growth of environmental technologies, telecommunications and computer technologies through exports, according to Alexandra Marks, Kerry's press secretary.

These industries are important to the Massachusetts economy, Marks said.

Both India and China are struggling with limited and outmoded power generations and transmission systems which have intensified environmental problems. China, where aggregate demand for power is increasing 8 percent a year, has relied heavily on coal for power generation.

"The key in creating and maintaining high paying jobs are by encouraging exports," Marks said.

Marks said Kerry believes environmental technologies — technology designed to clean up the environment — could be an important growth industry in Massachusetts.

There are over 100 environmental technology firms in Massachusetts according to Jon Ciccarelli, state director of the Massachusetts Small Business Development Center based at the University of Massachusetts.

This trip is also designed to help create a stronger bridge between growth industries in Massachusetts and those two countries that will be dominant economic players in the world for years to come," Kerry said.

According to Marks, the United States has no governmental agencies which seek out markets for U.S. companies.

Last month the Senate passed the Environmental Export Promotion Act, which was co-authored by Kerry. The legislation deals with the export of environmental technologies.

"Germany, France and Japan are ahead of us because they have government agencies which help businesses find export markets," Marks said.

Marks said the differences among U.S. trade policies and that of countries such as Germany and Japan is largely the result of 12 years of Republican control of the White House.

"Republicans fear big government so we have fallen behind," Marks said.

According to Ciccarelli, most of the Massachusetts environmental technology firms are internationally known.

"Environmental technology is a developing industry which grew from environmental legislation," said Barry Field, UMass professor of resource economics.

Field said he believes the legislation is a "win-win situation" because it is positive for the Massachusetts and U.S. economies and it is positive for the environment.

The developing nations lag behind in environmental technologies, but this legislation would help developing nations reach environmental goals according to John Stranlund, also a professor of resource economics at the University.

"These are opportunities we in Massachusetts can't afford to miss," Kerry said. "Our creativity and innovation put us on the cutting edge of technological advancements. We have a responsibility to tap those markets where those advances are needed most."

Delta Chi brothers Lenny Gokhman, Mario Alves and Doug Burke petitioned Haigis Mall passers-by yesterday for promises of clothing donations to the homeless.

Students to take off pants for drive

UMass fraternity sponsors clothing drive to aid the homeless

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The Delta Chi fraternity is asking University of Massachusetts students to give up their pants — in a clothes drive.

Delta Chi is running the drive to help the homeless, said sophomore Harlan Kroff, public relations chairman for Delta Chi.

"What we're really trying to do is get people's attention, catch their eye," Kroff said.

Delta Chi has set up a table at the Haigis Mall. Students are encouraged to collect some clothes during Thanksgiving vacation and donate them to the fraternity when they return after the break.

The fraternity will give the collected clothes to the Rev. Christopher Carlisle, a priest at the on-campus Episcopal chaplaincy. Carlisle works with Midnight Run, a charity organization helping the homeless in New York.

Delta Chi is not asking for donations at this time, simply the promise of donations following Thanksgiving vacation.

The fraternity is collecting all sorts of clothes and even canned goods, but they are concentrating on pants, said Christopher Small, a sophomore in the School of Management and the philanthropic chairman of Delta Chi.

"[We're collecting] anything that can be spared really," said Delta Chi brother Adam Diongello, a junior political science major.

Small said there has been early success in the drive but some people misunderstand the mode of donation.

"People are coming by and saying no [to donating]," said Small, "but after we explain it to them they usually say yes."

Delta Chi president Jason Rose said this drive is another in a series of public service projects designed to counteract the negative image he feels both the University students and administration have about fraternities.

"It's so difficult to get that image changed," said Rose, a sophomore. "We're trying hard to change that image."

"People think all we do is party and take advantage of women," Diongello said. "There are concerns about the elderly and homeless. We're doing something about it."

Delta Chi won the Most Improved Fraternity award from the Greek Council this year.

According to Small, Delta Chi has contributed to the status of local elderly. The fraternity also raked the lawns of elderly residents free of charge and has helped elderly couples move furniture so they would not have to pay for outside help.

Gordon ravages Fla., six dead, several injured

By Karen Testa

BAREFOOT BAY, Fla. — Pink insulation hung from broken branches like strips of confetti. The crumpled remains of mobile homes littered the streets. Drenched furniture lay buried under crushed metal and wooden beams.

"I said, 'What is that noise?' and everything blew," Seline Harrod recalled Wednesday. "I laid my face down on the floor and my husband laid on top of me."

Harrod and her neighbors told tales of terror the morning after Tropical Storm Gordon sent a tornado through this tight-knit retirement community, where people socialize over shuffleboard and fire auxiliary chicken dinners.

The storm generated other tornadoes and thunderstorms on a 200-mile path across Florida after devastating Haiti. Radio reports put the death toll in Haiti at up to 400.

In Florida, which has gotten 20 inches of rain since Sunday, six people died, scores were injured and dozens of homes destroyed.

The storm zigzagged around Cuba and south of the Florida Keys, then churned into the Gulf of Mexico and came ashore with wind near 50 mph on the state's west coast between Naples and Fort Myers.

The weakened storm spun out into the Atlantic late Wednesday with winds down to 45 mph. All tropical storm warnings were discontinued for Florida as Gordon moved northeast at 15 mph, a path it was expected to continue through Thursday.

Gov. Lawton Chiles declared a state of emergency for southern and central Florida, allowing the National Guard to be called in if needed.

In Barefoot Bay and Snug Harbor Lakes, an adjacent mobile home retirement community along the Atlantic Coast, the tornado destroyed 68 mobile homes, damaged more than 380, killed one man and injured 40, including two critically.

National Guard offers package to students for part-time service

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Army National Guard offers a combination of benefits particularly geared towards college students in exchange for part-time military service.

"There are many misconceptions about the Guard and a general lack of information about our programs," said Capt. John Smolenski, recruiting supervisor for western Massachusetts and a 1981 alumnus of the University of Massachusetts.

The Montgomery GI Bill is one of the main incentives for joining the National Guard, he said.

According to Smolenski, GIs are paid $190 per month while they are a full-time student for up to 36 months. The bill can pay up to $6,840 by the end of its term. This is a separate check to helps pay college fees and living expenses while the GI is in college, he said.

Lieutenant ranking possible

It is possible to be a member of ROTC and in the Guard in the Simultaneous Membership program, said UMass ROTC Captain Paul Guelle.

The benefits include more leadership training and more pay, and give the rank of a lieutenant upon graduation instead of simply an enlisted soldier. Graduates also have the option of going into active duty in the U.S. Army or remaining part of the National Guard.

Entering the Simultaneous Membership program requires students to behave like an officer, said Bill Wilson, a senior mechanical engineering major and member of the program.

"It's a good deal," said Wilson. "I like being in it."

Wilson described the high expectations put upon those in the program. According to Wilson, those in the program are expected to lead by example.

He also described a loss of familiarity with his former peers.

"People who used to be my peers I now have to treat like subordinates," Wilson said. "That's kind of a tough situation to be in."

The Guard offers free tuition to all state colleges and universities in and out of Massachusetts, Smolenski said.

"Over $300 and free tuition"

Full-time students enrolled in the Guard receive their $190 per month in addition to a regular salary of approximately $129 per month, said Smolenski.

"For one weekend a month and two weeks every summer you receive over $300 a month and free tuition," he said.

According to Smolenski, joining the Guard now would not interfere with the upcoming spring semester. Students enrolled would begin their one weekend a month and start to receive their salary.

The GI Bill payments would begin after completion of eight weeks of basic training and specialty training in the summers following the school semester, said Smolenski. Specialty training is specific training for whatever field the GI wishes to enter.

The GI has the opportunity to take all the training at once Instead of breaking it up into two summers if that is what he or she desires, making them eligible to receive their Bill payments sooner.

The Guard is under the state military division, said Smolenski, and the federal government would only call them for army service in the case of extreme national emergency as they did in Desert Storm. The governor of Massachusetts is the one who calls the Guard to active duty.

The Guard's major responsibilities include responding to natural disasters, such as earthquakes, floods, hurricanes and blizzards, or civil unrest, such as rioting.

The University will not penalize any students who are called to active duty, said Smolenski.

"It is an excellent opportunity to get some military experience while getting a full-time education," Smolenski said.

Anyone seeking more information about the National Guard can contact Capt. Smolenski at his office in the Hampshire Mall in Hadley.

Students encouraged to be on parents' insurance

■ Homeowners' insurance may compensate for stolen property

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

A female student at the University of Massachusetts returned to her dormitory room Sunday after a weekend at home and found her room had been broken into and some of her belongings were missing.

She called the police, she called her roommate and probably her own parents, but what about her insurance company?

The UMass police advise individuals living in the residence halls to be covered on their parents' home owner's insurance to prevent distress in these kind of situations, according to Phil Cavanaugh, the UMass police court officer.

With home owner's insurance, residents are covered for 10 percent of the losses that occur off the premises of the home, Cavanaugh said. This includes property lost through theft.

This applies not only to theft from dorm rooms, but also to theft in other areas on campus.

In early October, a man was arrested for stealing seven bicycles from the UMass campus, each of which cost $250 or more.

The recovered bikes were and returned to their owners, but had they been lost, home owner's insurance would probably have covered some of the loss.

The University does not carry insurance on losses on campus and is not legally responsible for lost, stolen or damaged property unless the University is at fault, according to the UMass Undergraduate Rights and Responsibilities manual.

In most cases of theft on campus, people are already covered but there are still some who are not, Cavanaugh said.

Residents are encouraged to get a "rider" on their parents' home insurance, according to Bob Campbell of residential living. A rider is an extension providing coverage to individuals who do not live at home.

Although the University does not cover stolen property, its goal is to retrieve the property and return it to the rightful owner, as was the case with the stolen bikes, Cavanaugh said.

Calif.'s Prop. 187 halted for 10 days due to court order

By Michael White
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A federal judge issued a temporary restraining order prohibiting the state from implementing most provisions of Proposition 187, the voter-approved measure that would deny public services to illegal immigrants.

The 10-day order applies to sections that would prohibit undocumented immigrants from receiving educational, social and non-emergency medical services. It does not apply to sections that pertain to the creation and use of false immigration papers, already a felony under federal law.

U.S. District Judge Matthew Byrne Jr. said there were "serious questions" as to whether the sections under the temporary restraining order would violate immigrants' rights to due process because the measure makes no provision for hearings to determine whether the denial was justly applied.

He said there was also the possibility that it infringes upon federal immigration law by requiring educators, police officers and others to do the job of U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service officers.

In arguments before the judge, American Civil Liberties Union attorney Mark Rosenbaum said the measure's worst impact would fall upon the sick and young children who have no control over their legal status.

He said that it already was keeping some immigrants away from hospitals and clinics, raising the possibility of immediate damage to their health.

"People in this community, large numbers, have stopped using services," he said.

Amherst offers public vaccination clinics

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — In an effort to decrease the death rate of senior citizens, the Amherst Health Department is offering vaccination clinics for flu and pneumonia.

According to Bettye Anderson Frederic, director of the Amherst Health Department, the flu vaccination is completely free to the public.

"The state provides the flu vaccination," Frederic said. "We provide the volunteers for the administration of the immunization."

The department also provides a pneumonia vaccination but because the state does not fund the vaccine, there is a $7 charge.

"Many people do not know these vaccines are available and effective," said Frederic. "We're trying to push physicians to remind their patients of the opportunity."

According to the Center for Communicable Disease, there are at least 200,000 cases of pneumonia, resulting in as many 40,000 deaths yearly. Some groups, including those infected with HIV, are more susceptible.

The Amherst Health Department said pneumonia is a vaccine-preventable disease. The department estimates 2,358 seniors are eligible for the immunization.

Frederic said the flu immunization has been available for five to seven years, but this is the first year the health department has made a push for the pneumonia vaccine.

"I was looking at the numbers of illnesses and deaths from pneumonia," she said. "It's something we can prevent, so we want to make a difference."

According to Frederic, the flu vaccination is not effective if there is a flu virus dormant when immunized.

The pneumonia vaccine covers 23 strains.

"The 23 strains of pneumonia are the most common, but there are still other kinds you could get," Frederic said.

She also said the flu immunization is extremely important — especially for senior citizens.

"People don't realize how bad the flu can be. When you think about winter and colds, get your flu shot," she said. "They do work, and the ones we give are free."

Frederic said the health department did one flu vaccination clinic in October that immunized over 400 people. Due to problems with the manufacturer, the pneumonia vaccine was not available then.

The next clinic, scheduled for Nov. 22 at 2 p.m. in the Bangs Community Center, will offer the pneumonia vaccine as well as the final chance for a flu vaccination, Frederic said.

Question: What is your attitude towards the American prison system?

Editor's note: This week is Prisoner Awareness Week.

Compiled by Tim White • Photos by Julio Cordero

"There is [overcrowding]. They put some people in prison when they shouldn't be, and some of the rapists get out early because of the overcrowding. You could build more prisons, but that would just be too many at one point."

— MICHELE SHAW
junior, exercise science
Centerville, Va.

"I think people are getting off too early. I know there are overcrowded prisons, but it still doesn't give a reason to let people off. I believe in capital punishment for the reason of overcrowding."

— STEVE YOUNG
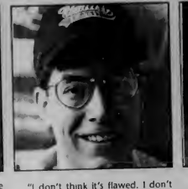
Boston

"I think it's overburdened. The prison system represents a larger socio-economic problem that we have today. In order to remedy the situation, I think we need more issues concerning family structures and communities. We need to deal with the cancer, not the chemotherapy."

— WILLIAM BAILEY-EISENHAUER
post-graduate, history
Lexington



"I don't think it's flawed. I don't think having a lot of prisoners causes crime. I equate higher crime with less punishment. If we have a higher crime rate, and more criminals, than we have to build more prisons. Just because there are too many people in jail, it doesn't mean they should get off."

— PAUL FERRO
freshman, political science
Marlboro

"The prisons are filling up with people faster than we can get them out. We don't seem to have any new legislation. At the moment I can't see [a solution]. Either the laws have to be less strict, or even stricter punishment with the death penalty."

— ADAM FELDSTEIN
senior, computer science
Baltimore, Md.

"I think as far as the way they treat prisoners, it's unfair, especially with education. Once you go to jail, they treat you like a dog, you don't have a chance to learn. I do believe they should use the death penalty more often — no mercy."

— ERROL LEE

Attorneys for the state asked Byrne to wait until regulations to implement the measure were written.

"The court has a responsibility, if possible, to find an interpretation of the statute that saves it," said Deputy Attorney General John Ichinaga.

Questioned by Byrne, Ichinaga said that a memo already had been drafted — but not distributed — authorizing police to ask for residency documents when dealing with people whom they suspect to be in the country illegally.

Ichinaga also said that regulations would provide for a hearing process for those denied state services, but Byrne said he could not take that into consideration because the regulations had not been drafted and he had no way of knowing for certain that hearings would be provided.

Opinion/Editorial

Prison system needs revamping

The American prison system is in desperate need of help. In 1992, of the 52 prison jurisdictions throughout the 50 states, Washington, D.C., and the federal prison system, 43 jurisdictions were operating at 100 percent prisoner capacity — or more. Some federal prisons were operating at almost 50 percent over their capacity and some state prisons were estimated to be operating at well over 100 percent their capacities.

It is cruel and inhumane punishment to cram prisoners into a space where they have no space — no breathing room of their own, no place to sit and be. We cannot expect people subjected to conditions most animals in kennels aren't even exposed to to be law-abiding citizens when they get out of jail.

The American attitude of locking away all "bad" people is the same concept as throwing all your dirty clothes under the bed — the clothes can be piled away and out of sight for only so long. After a while, the clothes will start to smell and it is time to do laundry, which requires crawling under the bed and finding everything stuffed under there.

The same applies to prisoners. It is only possible to stuff people who violate the law away in a cell, out of the sight and out of the minds of most average Joe citizens. There will come a time, however, when prisoners will rise up and demand to see the human rights so many Americans are big on promoting — for people far away and not in the United States.

It is time to take a look at why our social and economic systems are failing to find the roots of crime. Why is it the state and federal prison population has increased 168 percent since 1980? The reasons are deeply rooted in the inequities of our society. We need the courage to take a hard look at the system in which we live that drives people to kill their mothers and fathers and children. Why are we allowing this genocide to occur in our faces — and the only solution we have is "three strikes and you're out" and building more prisons.

This week is Prisoner Awareness Week. Be constructive, not in the design of more prisons but in the search for the truth in the American way of life.

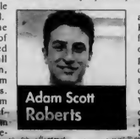
Hollywood icons are regular folks

Britons have the Windsors. Americans have the Kennedys and the whole notion of Camelot. However, Americans do have royalty and it extends far from the tall gates of the Kennedy compound. Here in the land of the free and home of the corrupt we have a little place called Hollywood.



Hollywood is the melting pot for all of America's so-- called royalty. We can't call them King or Queen, nor can we call them Prince or Princess. Instead, we call them something totally different: we call them Celebrities. We celebrate their fame and we reward them with wealth and give them extra special treatment. But do they actually deserve the red carpet treatment they receive?

Why are they so important to the average non-celebrated Americans? Why is it that society as a whole feels that we must worship the ground these people walk on? The truth of the matter is that a celebrity is a fabrication and creation of the public. The public wants to have people who aren't tangible to them or to the world as they know it.

Thousands flock to Planet Hollywoods world-wide in hope of catching a glimpse and maybe even a photo opportunity with one of these "celebrated" individuals.

Celebrities are workers and the only thing that sets these people apart from everyone else in society is that their work has a medium. This medium hurls images at us everyday wherever one looks and it is through this mediums that the "celebrated" people are packaged.

Newsstands and magazine racks are virtually Hollywood's great big family album. Where else can non-celebrated people catch a glimpse of Princess Diana doing thigh exercises, pictures of not-so Pretty Woman Julia Roberts dancing with Ethan Hawke, photos of Shannen Doherty getting plastered at the Roxbury, wedding nuptials and divorce court proceedings pics — all of it is at our disposal for our mere entertainment.

Are celebrities entertainers or are they in fact toys for society to play with? Celebrities are looked up to because in the roles they play they can do things average people wouldn't dare do.

Celebrities aren't born; they are created and this is a result of the media and the outlet in which they are showcased. Furthermore, the public is manipulated into thinking what someone actually is and brought to believe certain things. From these creations Americans and everyone else who isn't part of the Hollywood Circle are fooled. These people are just that — people.

Yes, celebrities do have sex; they do go to the bathroom; they do have problems; and yes, they even have feelings. These people are in the public's view and that is why we are drawn to them and feel as if we even know them.

I've met numerous celebrities and treated them the way they would like to be treated — as normal human beings. They are just doing their job to survive and if they happen to be launched into stardom that's fine too. Yet the important thing is to know that everyone is special and unique in their own way. It is only that not everyone gets to be on television or in the movies for the rest of the world to know that.

Hollywood is a very powerful place. It is where dreams are made and often broken. The greatest fact is that we all have the ability to dream. One doesn't have to be from Hollywood to make his or her dreams come true. When opportunities arise, individuals should evaluate the positive and negative factors about what will happen to them should they in fact jump at this opportunity. Opportunities come about every day for all of us and sometimes they are minor and other times they are major. As Americans we are fortunate enough to say that we live in the land of opportunity. By believing in oneself, the ability to attain individual dreams are in fact endless. Lights, cameras, action!

A night in the life of a dreamer

I had a dream the other night.

Actually I had two, but one ain't gonna be printed.

Anyway, I'm mingling in the streets of downtown Amherst with a woman named Cindy. . . Crawford, if I recall correctly. Yeah, so we're walking around, and she is all over me. Kissing and hugging me tirelessly, I mean PDA in full effect. Hey, I'm liking it, but the lipstick's all over the face, and the hands are all over me. I calmly tell her to relax, to tone it down a bit. Cindy understands and backs off.

So, Cindy and I continue to walk down North Pleasant and we head into Antonio's. All Cindy talks about is how she craves her favorite seafood slice, and complains about hunger pangs. I tell her generously, "Hey, it's on me." I put the buck and change down and pay the man.

What's odd is the behind the counter is Dave Thomas, the famed Wendy's man. He's trying to convince Cindy and me to have Biggie fries with the piece of pizza, but I turn him down. I wasn't about to shell out another dollar. I guess I am poor even in my damn dreams.

We then leave Antonio's — or Thomas', as the Dave-man insisted it was — and continue to walk down the street. I am then suddenly put into a headlock from some unknown assailant. With quick reaction, I rip his arms off me with brute strength, throw him against the ropes and give him a clothesline. I follow up with the patented leg drop. I go for the pin and Cindy, stuffing her face with the seafood slice, gives the culprit, Hulk Hogan, the three count.

After the pin, Cindy lends a hand to help me up after my victory but I slip back to the ground due to her greasy hands from the slice. A person walking on the street then reaches out to let me up. Who is it but Ricki Lake, who assists me and asks me to be on her show featuring, "guys who are walking innocently down the street with a gorgeous supermodel and get put into a headlock by a professional wrestler."

I accept the offer, though I am puzzled that this actually happens to other people. After shaking hands with me, Ricki walks away and heads into Subway. I then glance over to the left and see Davy and Goliath blankly staring at what used to be Uptown Pizza. Out of nowhere, Davy heaves a large rock through the front glass, screams out several obscenities and storms off after Goliath, who is busy chasing an elderly woman across Main Street.

Cindy and I continue to walk to the bus stop. The bus arrives and the door opens. The driver, surprisingly, is Theo Huxtable of "Cosby Show" fame. He tells me he is a big fan of mine, that he has seen me in one of my Dining Common performances. I give him a strange look, but Cindy explains to me that I have become a star by singing in DCs across the UMass campus during lunches. I nod my head and smile over my newly-acquired fame.

I sit down with Cindy and sitting in front of us is Gary Coleman, Ralph Malph from "Happy Days" and Emmanuel Lewis. "So the child stars from sitcoms do hang out together," I say to Cindy. I look over at Cindy, and she's flirting with Ralph freaking Malph, I then am there and say to myself, "What does she see in Ralph Malph that she doesn't see in me?" I look over at her again, and she's mowing on another seafood slice — compliments of Ralph Malph. I guess he was and always will be a sucker.

We get off the bus at Haigis Mall and see a crowd of people gathered around the reflection pool. We manage our way to the front to see what was going on. It turns out that Milli is racing against Vanilli in the butterfly. What is particularly annoying is I can't see too well because of Mike Tyson, who is sitting on a unicycle right in front of me.

Cindy and I, disappointed that we couldn't see the photo- finish where Milli edged out Vanilli by inches, leave Haigis Mall just for the fun of it. I knock Tyson off the unicycle. He apologizes for getting in my way and quickly rides off.

It is getting late. Cindy begs me to come back to her room in Sylvan. Even with Hulk, Dave Thomas, Ricki, Davy and Goliath, Theo, Gary Coleman, Ralph Malph, Emmanuel Lewis, Tyson, Milli and Vanilli, I figured maybe it was real.

Until I made the walk of shame home from Sylvan that night. Then I woke up.

Notes from the Basement

If yesterday was Friday, is today Saturday? If it is, why are we in classes? But if today is Saturday, tomorrow's Sunday, and we still have classes? I don't get it.

Actually, not many people do. It's the mentality of the administration here at the University to confuse the student body as much as possible, especially when it has to do with classes.

This whole idea of making Wednesdays Fridays and Tuesdays Mondays doesn't make much sense, mainly because there isn't a good explanation for it from anyone.

A lot of people were not even aware that yesterday was Friday, mainly because you couldn't find out about it unless you searched through your new pre-reg guide.

Ask your professors and they'll most likely tell you they don't know why Wednesday classes are singled out and wiped clean from our schedule and replaced by Friday classes. It is just accepted, University-wide. Kind of like the question about parking in a driveway and driving on a parkway.

Another question — what are you supposed to do about work schedules on these pseudo-Fridays? Do you act like it is Friday and leave at 3 p.m., or imitate some professors on this campus and not even show up on the last day of the work week?

******

Dicky V. came to town and left in a blaze of glory. Vitale's college basketball special on ESPN Tuesday night, which was billed as something great for the University, pretty much disappointed many who watched.

Standing behind a podium in the VIP room in the William D. Mullins Center, Mr. Vitale went crazy in a simulated press conference with questions from coaches and players from across the nation.

The view of the Mullins Center floor and the Massachusetts players practicing on it, seen by the television audience through the bay window behind Vitale, was spectacular. It could have done wonders for the image and perception of the University.

But didn't, because the viewer in Idaho was never told that Vitale was holding his "press conference" in the Mullins Center in Amherst. Well, Hadley, but still.

One final thing about the show — loosen up, Cal.

******

It's nice to see some bands still play for the fun of it. Give credit to G. Love for coming and playing the Campus Center for free. Although he did do his best impersonation of McDonald's and held the Special Sauce.

That is, until G. Love and Special Sauce took the stage at Pearl Street, when they jammed some four hours later for another one and a half hour show.

Santa's holiday not celebrated by all

The holiday is approaching, and everyone knows it. The vacation, the food, the relatives. No, I'm not talking about Thanksgiving, but Christmas. Come Nov. 25, the season has begun.

Heck, this year's Christmas already began a while ago. I've already seen one of those specialty Christmas shops when I was at the Holyoke Mall more than two weeks ago.

While Christmas is the Christian celebration of Jesus Christ's birth, lately it has turned into something else.

Christmas music fills the cars of all the shoppers who cram into the malls to buy gifts. Lights come up all over buildings everywhere. Mall Santas wait in shopping centers to greet children and gather on street corners to collect money for charities. Basically, the whole country becomes one big celebration. At least for one group of American citizens.

What people seem to forget is that there are millions of people in this great country who do not celebrate Christmas, and this time becomes quite trying for them.

I have no problem with people who go to midnight mass or buy gifts for loved ones. Religious celebrations are very important and if someone wishes to celebrate Jesus' birth, that is their right. My problem is with the commercialism that has arisen in the holiday.

It is the bombardment that gets on my nerves — like the fact that if I go to the mall in Deeember everyone assumes I am there to buy Christmas presents. I get bombarded with songs about how wonderful Christmas is, and litrle Santas welcome me to all the stores I enter. When I buy something, the salesperson says goodbye with a cheery, "Merry Christmas."

Movies and shows about the wonders of the season come out, from this year's The Santa Clause and Miracle on 34th Street, to such standbys as Dr. Seuss' "How the Grinch Stole Christmas" and It's a Wonderful Life, which I am told will be played only once this year — for perhaps the first time in known history.

The holiday is so dominating that it has even changed other celebrations at the time. It is not part of the holiday of Chanukah to exchange gifts. Yet due to the proximity of Christmas, gifts are now exchanged so Jewish youngsters do not feel like they are missing out. My parents even celebrated Christmas for the first 10 or so years of my life, so I wouldn't feel like an outcast in my formative years at elementary school.

Now, just so you don't misunderstand me, there are some things about Christmas I like. The fact that people become more charitable at this time is wonderful. Why they don't feel they can give money the rest of the year, I do not know.

I'm not trying to say that you can't celebrate Christmas if you're Christian. I just wish people would have a little sensitivity at this time. Not everyone celebrates the holiday — contrary to popular opinion. Take a step back. Don't go around wishing everyone a Merry Christmas. Just remember that people all have their own beliefs and imposing yours on someone else isn't as pleasant for them as it may be for you.

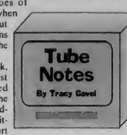
TV gets swept up in November

It's mid-November, and as any serious television addict knows, this means we're in the throes of sweeps month — a curious time of year when all the major networks start throwing out all kinds of bizarre, eye-catching programs in an attempt to win special favor from the attention span- impaired viewing public.



Overall, it's been a fairly spirited week, with most shows parading special guest stars or some abrupt and unexpected romantic intrigue. But clearly most of the standard offerings have been overshadowed by the arrival of CBS' much- awaited, eight-hour miniseries "Scarlett" — part one of which I saw this past Monday.

First, a bit of background on "Scarlett:" it's based on Alexandra Ripley's mediocre best-selling sequel to Margarct Mitchell's novel Gone with the Wind, which itself was made into a motion picture blockbuster in 1939.

Having seen the original film, I must admit it is pretty much impossible for me to review "Scarlett" without making implicit (and possibly unfair) comparisons between the two.

And because this 1994 miniseries obviously doesn't live up to the ground-breaking acting or technical standards of GWTW, probably the only people who are going to be captivated by the trials and tribulations of Scarlett O'Hara this time around are those who (unlike me) haven't already had the classic film permanently tattooed on their brains.

To be absolutely honest, I never much cared for the tor-

Anne Rice's novel makes smooth transition to screen

By E.C. Thomas
Collegian Staff

For those of us who have read The Vampire Chronicles, the characters are more than just fictional deities from the imaginations of Anne Rice. Instead they are living, breathing individuals who you come to love — and hate — dearly. To read Rice's chronicles is to be transported into a world where evil becomes so seductive that a vampire's true nature (killing people) becomes acceptable and your own desire for immortality becomes insatiable.

You long to be in the arms of Louis, whose very being is filled with an alluring yet innocent passion; or at the side of Lestat, as he spirits through another one of his reckless adventures; or to just stare into the faces of Armand and Claudia, the dark Raphael angels

As someone so obsessed with Rice's characters, I have been anxiously awaiting the opening of Neil Jordan's film, Interview With the Vampire, although with certain reservations. The idea of this impassioned story being marred by the greedy hands of Hollywood and judged by the rigid standards of mainstream American movie audiences was very unsettling. These characters and their stories are in many ways sacred, and the subsequent casting of Tom Cruise and Brad Pitt sent chills through Rice devotees.

However, while watching the trailers for Interview, a nervous sense of glee filled me. Going to see the movie would be much like finally meeting these individuals face to face. And indeed, I walked away from seeing the movie feeling like I had at least been fulfilled with a glimpse of my beloved.

Brad Pitt did an exceedingly good job at convincing me he was Louis. Pitt's performance successfully balanced Louis' reserved nature with his deep passions, so that the character became neither dull nor overdramatic. It is to his credit (and Jordan's) that the character maintained the thoughtful and endearing qualities that Rice gave Louis in her books.

However, the struggles of Louis' human soul to conform to the dark world of the vampire became somewhat muddled when going

INTERVIEW WITH THE VAMPIRE
Directed by Neil Jordan with Tom Cruise, Brad Pitt
Kirsten Dunst & Antonio Banderos

Oprah walked out. Yesiree, only 15 minutes into Interview With the Vampire, there's a moment when Tom Cruise's dastardly and decadent vampire Lestat picks up a rat off the floor, bites out its throat and drips its blood into a wine glass. Upon witnessing this, Ms. Winfrey reportedly bolted from the theater. In the lobby, she and her closest friends gathered in a circle. . . and prayed.

Jeesh, Oprah, what were you afraid of? Unless you're scared of hammy acting and muddled plotting, there's nothing at all to be frightened of in Interview With the Vampire. While the film does rise to some scary occasions, the effect is minor and transient; more than a boo!, less than a lasting jolt. It's exactly what it pretends to be — a big-budget Hollywood star trip. . . with fangs. And even if those fangs only scratch the surface, the film delivers in spite of itself.

Director Neil Jordan (The Crying Game) deserves credit for keeping the Gothic aura consistent throughout — there isn't the overwrought, near-hysterical tone you might expect (see Mary Shelley's Frankenstein). Yet it's lacking the sense of romantic dread and passion of the novel. Jordan instead seems interested in walking the line between macabre humor and dimestore pathos — and he does, with the skill of a master manipulator.

The story is far from simple. Brad Pitt is Louis, an 18th century New Orleans plantation owner who is grief-stricken by the death of his wife and daughter. Rakish vampire Lestat (Cruise) offers Louis eternal life as a vampire and the chance to escape the pain of death. He accepts, but he's not really in tune with the vampire life as much as Lestat, who takes seductive glee in sucking the blood out of lusty maidens and hunky beaus. On the other hand, Louis prefers to feed on rats and chickens and seems unimpressed (and a bit annoyed) by Lestat.

Lestat senses Louis' growing displeasure with him and tries to bind him closer by creating a companion, a "daughter" for Louis and himself. Eleven-year-old Claudia hungrily sucks the blood and tries to bind him closer by creating a companion, a "daughter" for Louis and himself. Eleven-year-old Claudia hungrily sucks the blood from Lestat, her golden curls tightening as she becomes a vampire. "I want some more," she purrs, sending the audience into creepy hysterics.

Up to this point, Interview balances the black-comic relishes of Lestat with the ponderous, almost whiny asides of Louis and Claudia's troubling sexuality (she keeps growing mentally but not physically). But after a tense showdown with Lestat, Claudia and Louis flee, intent on searching the world for other vampires and answers to questions Lestat refused to answer.

The pair meet up with said neck-biters in Paris, where Antonio Banderas plays Armand, the leader of a group of vampires who double as a bizarre theater group. They are brought to the Theater of the Vampires to stand trial by Stephen Rea, another vampire.

This is where Interview becomes muddled and unfocused. What, exactly, is Louis looking for, a vampire support group? And who is Armand? What is his relationship to Lestat or the vampire played by Rea? To readers and rabid followers of the book, this is easily explainable; they know the background of these characters. But in its film incarnation, Interview is entirely too vague in its later characterizations, even surface ones.

It's a frustrating finish because in the film's first two acts, Jordan keeps the action moving so fast, it's hard to notice the seams. There's genuine tension here, coupled with a keen — and refreshingly ghoulish — camp sensibility. When Lestat lectures Claudia on not killing people in the house, it's a funny moment amid the terror. But it's not played merely for the punch line; this isn't Freddy Kreuger rattling off a one-liner. It's deeper than that, cutting the tension of the moment without diluting the terror.

The big news is Tom Cruise doesn't fall flat on his face, but let's face it — even Keanu Reeves couldn't totally screw up this role. Though sometimes Cruise sounds suspiciously like his "I want the truth!" character from A Few Good Men, he satisfies the audience's curiosity for wanting to see

Director Neil Jordan finds Vampire a worthy challenge

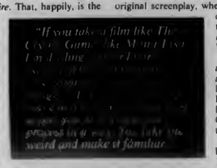
By Douglas J. Rowe
Associated Press

Wind is howling through the canyons of high-rises in midtown, the sound noticeable and nerve-racking as Neil Jordan is interviewed about Interview With the Vampire. That, happily, is the only cliched trapping of a horror film that insinuates itself into the real-life setting, a 19th-floor hotel suite.



"If you take a film like The Crying Game, like Mona Lisa, I'm dealing with ordinary aspects of life and showing these strange, extraordinary things. . . If you do something that's in a totally invented landscape, you do the opposite process in a way: You take the weird and make it familiar."

The sun rides high in the forenoon blue sky. Despite the wannabe gale, the windows don't rattle, and neither the door nor floor creak as Jordan enters and walks to the sofa where he tucks his legs under him.

It's fitting, too, for the director proceeds to discuss how he assiduously avoided cliches in making the film adaptation of Anne Rice's cult novel.

Noting that the 1976 best seller is told from the vampires' point of view, Jordan said: "It's a totally original perspective, which gave me the opportunity to make a movie that kind of reinvents the landscape a bit."

He wouldn't have been interested in making a movie using visual conventions of the genre — bats flying around, stakes through the heart, huge shadows and Gothic arches. The main characters, Lestat and Louis, don't come from Transylvania, either.

"You don't have to have anybody saying: 'I do not drink wine,'" Jordan said, alluding to the line Bela Lugosi utters in the 1931 classic film.

The 44-year-old director was still basking in the afterglow of his 1992 smash, The Crying Game, which netted Jordan the Academy Award for best original screenplay, when producer David Geffen came along and asked him to consider directing Interview With the Vampire.

"I've been wanting to do a movie that was somehow a bit Gothic," he said, as he puffed on a Marlboro Light, acknowledging that his last film (with its six Oscar nominations) was a tough act to follow.

Jordan had two flops between his acclaimed 1986 movie Mona Lisa and The Crying Game. He directed High Spirits, a 1988 comedy with Daryl Hannah and Peter O'Toole, but the producer edited the movie without Jordan's consent and the film bombed. Then came We're No Angels, an odd movie starring Robert De Niro that never found an audience.

"If you take a film like The Crying Game, like Mona Lisa, I'm dealing with ordinary aspects of life and showing these strange, extraordinary things. . . If you do something that's in a totally invented landscape, you do the opposite process in a way: You take the weird and make it familiar."

Before that, however, he had to grapple with a couple of highly publicized problems.

Once Daniel Day-Lewis decided he couldn't play Lestat, Tom Cruise got the role, drawing criticism from no less than Rice herself. The author said Cruise "is no more my Vampire Lestat than Edward G. Robinson is Rhett Butler."

Jordan also had to respond to rumors that he had bowdlerized the book, toning down its homoerotic elements.

He thinks both plaints have been refuted, maintaining that Cruise fills the role's specifications — being young, beautiful, seductive, almost indestructible — and that the story's sexuality is quite apparent.

In retrospect, Jordan said, he didn't realize the enormity of the book's following and how strongly those people felt, so he wasn't braced when "fire and brimstone came raining down on my head" because he chose Cruise.

Jordan said he thought there was something slightly unfinished in the book, something undeveloped, and he wanted to make that the spine of the movie.

"I think that was the whole kind of question of morality, you know," he said. "The book was almost like a moral tale — the whole issue of this individual who has become eternal and yet has become a monster and is saying, 'Why doesn't God strike me down because what I'm doing is so evil that under any ordinary moral system you wouldn't countenance it?'"

In traditional tales people who do evil typically get punished. But for Lestat, there's no moral payback.

"He can live with that, but Louis (Brad Pitt)

SHORT CUTS

People and Pop Culture in the News

If anyone tuned in to MTV this weekend, then you know that Pedro Zamora has passed away. But like life, the show must go on. Auditions for "The Real World IV" — to be shot in London — is already being cast. And speaking of casts, UMass' own Adam Scott Roberts (ex-Campus man and zealous Collegian columnist) has made the first cut for the London beat. Congratulations.

If you too yearn for that 15 minutes of fame and are a female associated with radio broadcasting, have you considered posing for Playboy? Those bungle bunnies have had another brain wave and are currently searching the country for female forms to grace their "Girls of Shock Radio" layout. Requirement? Having the sexist personality (and big boobs help too) plus a willingness to add visual elements to radio waves. Nude photos in your application will not be required. Nice of them.

Recently the world celebrated the anniversary of the King's death and the birth of a rock 'n roll legend. No. Lisa Marie and Michael did not renew their wedding vows at the Memphis gala, but the happy couple with sister Janet and mother-in-law Priscilla shared a box.

Attention all decks. almost-Captain of the Starship Voyager Genevieve Bujold may be slapped with a multimillion dollar lawsuit from Paramount for a breach of contract.

How much money did Tom Hanks get paid for being "stupid is as stupid does?" Not a lot as far as pay goes, but benefit-wise he's making a cool $65 million. It's because he took a pay cut he got a percentage of the movies gross revenue instead. Sweet deal.

If you loved Kirsten Dunst in Interview With the Vampire, you can catch her again at Christmas time when Louisa May Alcott's Little Women hits the big screen. She plays Amy as a youngster.

If you have a million questions for either William Shatner or Patrick Stewart you can ask them personally on Dec. 11. For $100 and the chance to be one of 12 random people, you can have a phone conversation with the two Captains. Hey, it's worth a shot.

Ricki Lake decided to boost her ratings and public awareness by taking 15 loyal followers and hand-cuffing them and herself to the offices of designer Karl Lagerfeld. The hearty group was protesting the use of furs in Lagerfeld's designs. Lake and friends got thrown into the slammer and charged with criminal trespass, criminal mischief and criminal tampering. It was also in jail where she signed more autographs, photos and group pictures than anywhere else. Isn't that special?

Books — 'I, Vampire'

Although Anne Rice seems to be dominating the market as far as vampire stories go, other authors have jumped onto the bandwagon with similar results.

I, Vampire by Michael Romkey is a book that closely follows the modern version of a vampire — debonair, reckless and passionate. Written in the first person, the book depicts the story of David Parker, a law student in the late '80s who falls prey to cocaine, alcohol and a meaningless life.

He contemplates suicide until he meets a mysterious violinist, Tatiana Nicolaievna Romanov, a vampire and the only surviving daughter of the Russian Czar Nicholas. Tatiana makes David immortal and exposes him to an underground world of vampires called the Illuminati. Members of this elite group include Mozart, Rasputian and other famous people forever immortalized.

The plot may sound far–fetched but it works and the story is fast–paced and easy to follow. Parker is as enigmatic as Lestat and as soul–searching as Louis. Plus if you get hooked, the story is continued The Vampire Papers.

Video — Nirvana

In the wake of Kurt Cobain's untimely death it was inevitable that a barrage of "behind the scenes" memorabilia of the Nirvana frontman would emerge. Already the band's MTV Unplugged album has hit record shelves and the charts, and now almost as a companion piece is the 83–minute documentary Live! Tonight! Sold Out!

The videotape chronicles the rise and fall of Cobain and his band as well as footage of 15 songs performed live. Along with all this, there are the usual interviews and clips from the band members' personal achieves.

While all this sounds pretty run–of–the–mill, there is no denying that the loss of such an artistically interesting musician such as Cobain will spark an above average interest in the video.

The video was originally conceived by Cobain but was put on hold after his suicide. Drummer David Grohl and bassist Krist Novoselic decided to complete what Cobain started and finished editing what should be the definitive chronicle of one of the most important bands of recent time.

Video — Weezer

If you are limited to HSCN you probably haven't had the pleasure of seeing it, but all of you with MTV have no doubt seen the new video by the new buzz–clip/alterna– poster boys of the moment, Weezer.

The video is for the second single off their self–titled debut, "Buddy Holly," and is the catchiest to come along in a long time, with the video causing an urge to view and view and view.

The video is done by one of the more cutting edge directors around today, Spike Jonze, who has a knack for making videos which are candy for the eye. He has recently done the videos for "Cannonball" by the Breeders, "Sabotage" by the Beastie Boys, and "If I Only Had a Brain" by MC 900ft Jesus.

By getting Paramount's permission to use over 30 different episodes from "Happy Days," Jonze was able to create the illusion of Weezer playing in Al's Diner.

The video has earned Weezer the honor of being the youngest band to date to have a video granted MTV Exclusive status.

With pride & no apologies, Melissa Etheridge rocks into Mullins

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Changes encapsulate our lives.

Sometimes they are subtle, and you do not even recognize them until they are gone. Sometimes they reach out and grab you, transporting you to another place in a foreign land far, far away.

This Saturday night at the Mullins Center, the stage will be graced by an artist who has seen both sides of this scenario in her career. Melissa Etheridge will bring her "knock 'em dead" vocals and the rock, rhythm and blues genre to Amherst in her only area appearance.

There should be no disappointment in her live show as this lady of the blues has paid her dues with years and thousands of miles on the road establishing herself as one of the, if not the, premiere female vocalists on any musical scene.

Before the commercial success that has blessed her the past few years, Etheridge toured the Midwest continuously in the early to mid–'80s, playing in any low–down honky– tonk or barroom that would let her play. One of the changes that evolved from this stage in her career was the slow transition from her early country influences to the straight– edge rock that now encompasses her latest release, Yes I Am.

All those hard fought hours of getting her music to the masses finally paid off with her eponymous 1988 album, her first major recording. Her country stylings resonate on this release, but with singles like "Chrome Plated Heart" you can infer the heart–wrenching, Janis Joplin–esque songwriting and singing methods that would surface in upcoming years.

With her next release, 1989's Brave and Crazy, the subtle transformation continued. With the title track and songs like "Testify" (with a little help from Bono of U2 on this one), the portrait of an artist as a young woman began to evolve to another level. But not lost was the pulling of the heart strings inherent to the country genre, with tracks like "When You Used To Love To Dance" and "You Can Sleep While I Drive."

The intermingling of styles brought Etheridge her first Grammy nomination (eventually lost to Toni Childs) and that, combined with the platinum status of her first two albums, changed her life completely and put her into the music business spotlight.

Success continued with Never Enough (1992), where she finally won the Grammy for Best Female Rock Performance, and has culminated in her multi–million seller, Yes I Am (1994). Rawbone blues echoes in opening track "I'm The Only One," and songs like "Resist and "All American Girl" come through as straight rockers. But never lost is the feeling and emotion that began her musical career, especially in her Robert Johnson–like "Come To My Window." In the music video for this song, Juliette Lewis wonderfully portrays the desperation and exasperation that ". . . is love, anyway" in this song.

Etheridge has also begun to receive admiration from others in the music industry for both her own songwriting and recent covers she has done. From Billy Joel's drop–jawed reaction to her rendition of "New York State Of Mind" at a tribute show, to the Joplin medley that included "Cry" and "Little Piece of My Heart" at Woodstock '94, she has shown that she can do other people's songs just as well, if not better, than the original.

Change has swirled around the career of Melissa Etheridge, from the changes in her music to the monumental differences between the barroom scene and the hundreds of thousands at Woodstock this summer.

That next cup of coffee may be hazardous to you

By Peg Mitchel
Collegian Correspondent

Coffee. Mmm. . . that oh–so–pleasing aroma drifts by the noses of many Americans every day. Whiffs of hazelnut, chocolate, raspberry, vanilla almond and many other wild flavors permeate almost every nearby coffee shop and cafe.

According to Consumer Reports, the United States is now the largest importer of coffee beans in the world and statistics show that more Americans drink coffee than do not.

But the caffeine craze isn't without its critics.

"I was a heavy coffee drinker," said Will Brinkley, a University of Massachusetts environmental science and communications major. "It made me feel even more tired. The more we drink, the more our bodies build up a tolerance to its stimulant effects."

So what are the facts about caffeine? Is it really that bad?

"People go out to cafes for hours to drink coffee for social reasons. But for me coffee really messed up my energy level," said Erica Yinter, another former coffee drinker.

"As a woman I'm concerned about my bones being strong. Caffeine isn't a healthy choice."

A 1992 report by Nation's Business describes caffeine as a "mild stimulant on the central nervous system." Caffeine is found naturally in coffee and cocoa beans, tea leaves and coconuts and is added to many soft drinks and over the counter medications.

Within 30 to 60 minutes of intake, caffeine levels peak in the bloodstream to produce alertness and heightened concentration.

However, caffeine creates dependence. Drinkers who are deprived of their usual consumption may suffer headaches, fatigue, anxiety and a weakened ability to perform physical tasks.

The drug has also been linked to infertility, miscarriages and the hindrance of iron and calcium absorption. An article in Health magazine linked high levels of caffeine with worsened symptoms in anorectics, bulimics and binge eaters.

Researchers who interviewed 171 patients with eating disorders found that those who consumed over 750 mg of caffeine per day (about eight cups), were more anxious, binged, fasted and used diet pills more often.

So how much caffeine is actually in that steaming cup you reach for every morning? According to Consumer Reports, six ounces of most brewed coffees have approximately 100 mg of caffeine, give or take 30 mg. And remember that usual coffee cups hold eight to 12 ounces, not six. Instant coffee falls below brewed kinds at 50 to 90 milligrams per six–ounce cup.

According to Robin Levine at University Health Services, drinking 16 ounces of coffee per day will probably not be detrimental to your health. Some people, however, should avoid caffeine altogether. These people include those who regularly suffer from ulcers and acid indigestion.

Due to caffeine's link to miscarriages and infertility, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration in 1980 advised pregnant women and those who might become pregnant to limit or eliminate their caffeine intake altogether.

As for the question of iron and calcium absorption, Robin Levine advises not to consume coffee within two hours of a meal of mineral supplement to allow

Reunion album revives Zeppelin glory

By Joshua Boyd

NO QUARTER: PLANT & PAGE UNLEDDED
Robert Plant & Jimmy Page
Atlantic Records

When two fossils of rock n' roll's good times (you know, the '60s and the '70s, of course) get together to jam, the mountains rumble and MTV jumps on the opportunity to exploit the moment any way they can.

So is the case with '70s super–groups Led Zeppelin and the Eagles. Both have recently done reunion shows on MTV, but let's focus on the former at this time. Only half of Led Zeppelin, vocalist Robert Plant and guitarist Jimmy Page, decided to do the reunion. John Paul Jones, former bassist and keyboardist for the group, just wasn't interested. Drummer John Bonham died in 1980.

Plant and Page decided to play with many of their old compositions, such as the obvious redoing of "No Quarter," the eerie tune from Zeppelin's landmark 1973 album, Houses of the Holy. With no percussion whatsoever and glazed acoustic guitars making a bed of sound for Plant's filtered vocals, this song keeps its original dark mood, if not increases it.

On some of their old songs they added new textures and noticeably Eastern flavors (they recorded with an Egyptian ensemble, playing various strings and percussions, and with musicians from Marrakesh). More notable tunes were "Friends," "The Battle of Evermore" and that classic rock radio staple, "Kashmir." The 1975 version had Eastern influences itself, but this is tremendous and with the ensemble and the London Metropolitan Orchestra, spectacular.

Of note are three new Plant/Page songs, their first real collaborations since their 1979 studio swan song on Swansong Records, the In Through The Out Door album. The song "Yallah" is stated by an Eastern percussion line and quick–sung lyrics by Plant. That is the best of the bunch. "City Don't Cry" and "Wonderful One" are both average performances. On this album, an average performance can be considered uplifting, as compared with other "MTV Unplugged" ventures.

Neither of these two aging musicians are ready for the rocking chair. Plant has preserved his old whiny voice and Page can still churn out original, concise and winning sounds on the wide array of guitars he used on this album.

They truly show no quarter — and no signs of giving up anytime soon. A–

Cowboys, cops, Speed on to videotape

By Dolores Barclay
Associated Press

SPEED
Directed by Jan de Bont with Keanu Reeves, Sandro Bullock
Dennis Hopper & Joe Morton

Speed is quite a ride — a heart-stopping race against death and terror. It is slowed only by terrible dialogue and a painfully wooden and laughable performance by Keanu Reeves, who stars as he-man supercop Jack Traven.

The movie opens with Traven and his partner, Harry (Jeff Daniels), a bomb expert, combing through an office building where a crazed extortionist (Dennis Hopper) has trapped an elevator full of people between floors with bombs placed on the emergency brakes.

The duo fearlessly climb down the elevator shaft, discover the bombs, realize they can't easily diffuse them and come up with an idea for removing the passengers. But the lunatic bomber is six steps ahead of them.

The sequence is a good one, and you hold your breath until the last second. Hopper is good and mad, having been thwarted by Traven and foiled his $3 million ransom for the elevator hostages. So he sets up another catastrophe and pits himself against Traven. This time it's very, very personal.

Hopper takes on city buses. One, he dispatches immediately; the other provides the action for the remainder of the movie. You see, Hopper has planted a bomb on a bus. It is activated once the bus reaches 50 mph and will explode if the speed dips below 50.

Much disbelief must be suspended if you want to enjoy this ride. Otherwise, you'll sit shaking your head and laughing at the filmmakers.

Sandra Bullock puts in a good turn as one commuting passenger, Annie, who must take over the wheel once the driver is felled by a bullet.

The bus sequences offer some of the most imaginative stunts seen in recent years. Watch especially for Annie and Jack's departure from the speeding vehicle and the bus' Evel Knievel leap.

Blame the writing problems on Graham Yost, who makes his feature film debut with Speed. His other credits include TV sitcoms — "Herman's Head" and Nickelodeon's "Hey Dude," among them.

WYATT EARP
Directed by Lawrence Kasdan with Kevin Costner, Dennis Quaid
Mare Winningham & Gene Hackman

If you crave a good Western and want to delve into Wyatt Earp's life, then go rent or buy the video Tombstone. It's a great movie, plus you'll get to see Val Kilmer's incredible and sensitive portrayal of Doc Holliday.

In other words, you can avoid Lawrence Kasdan's overblown Wyatt Earp. Into the second hour of Kasdan's film, after an hour of an uninteresting childhood tale, you wonder why the movie was made.

And as you strain through the third hour, you just wonder when it's going to end. Even then you have to wait another 10 minutes, since Kasden tacks on an anecdote of yet another Earp heroic deed.

Wyatt Earp is leaden and episodic, and relies almost entirely on a very wooden Kevin Costner in the title role. Even the commanding presence of Gene Hackman as Earp's father, and Dennis Quaid as a gaunt Doc Holliday, can't instill much excitement.

Quaid, who lost a great deal of weight to appear as the tuberculosis-ravaged Doc, gives an odd portrayal. His Southern accent is hard to identify, as is his misplaced anger. But he's interesting to watch. Isabella Rossellini does a good turn as Doc's companion, Kate Elder.

James Newton Howard provides an intrusive score that swells with strings every time the camera pans the landscape.

BEVERLY HILLS COP III
Directed by John Landis with Eddie Murphy, Judge Reinhold

Beverly Hills Cop III is the dumbest of the cop trio. This time around, Axel tackles a counterfeit ring that uses a theme park, WonderWorld, as its headquarters. There are no surprises, there's no real police work to unravel, and there are no mysteries. It's all very predictable with lots of gunplay, noise and blood.

The movie opens in Detroit, where Axel and his fellow cops are about to raid a chop shop and walk right into a double-cross involving some carjackers, who are selling stolen government printing paper, and some counterfeiters, led by WonderWorld's head of security, Ellis DeWald (Timothy Carhart).

The carjackers are blown away and the cars are riddled with bullets, even though the cops can't seem to shoot straight and never think of blowing out the tires so the bad guys can't get away.

But our superhero is in hot pursuit and almost nabs DeWald when he's stopped by the feds, who say they want him to get away so they can trace his operation. Only one problem: Axel's boss is killed in the gunfight, and Axel wants revenge. A clue sends him to WonderWorld in Southern California. . . and Beverly Hills.

Once there, the Beverly Hills jokes abound.

Judge Reinhold reprises his role as Billy Rosewood, who now has his own office. Hector Elizondo appears as Flint, a seasoned cop waiting for his retirement.

Bronson Pinchot pops up once again as Serge, the gallery owner who now sells weapons for "upper-income urban fighters." It's an over-the-top stereotype that adds little to the

VELOCITY GIRL, SWIRLIES
Student Union Ballroom
Nov. 15

It is no doubt that Washington D.C.'s Velocity Girl want to see themselves as the undisputed kings of the pop world. For quite some time the five-piece band have slowly but surely been evolving from noisy experimentalism to purveyors of pop so pristine it practically gleams when played.

This was never so evident as this past Thursday evening when the band took the stage at the University of Massachusetts Student Union Ballroom and played a set which can only be described as sterile at best.

Kicking the set off with the song "Drug Girls" from their latest release Simpatico, the band set the tone early for their lackluster performance. The song, while somewhat catchy, never achieves anything past "ho-hum" status due in part to Velocity Girl's apprehensive and bland delivery. This seemed to be the problem with much of the band's show. While all of the songs were fine, none of them ever made any sort of lasting impression.

There were a few brief fleeting moments of brilliance though, occurring whenever the band seemed to let their pop-tinged hair down during such songs as "Keep On Smiling" and the band's classic early single "My Forgotten Favorite."

On the S.U.B. stage Velocity Girl proved that they are not necessarily a bad band, but seem to be so bogged down with trying to (excuse the cliche) not "rock" that their music suffers in the process.

Maybe Velocity Girl should take a lesson from opening band The Swirlies, who proved that playing pop music doesn't necessarily mean you have to be saccharine-sweet.

The Boston-based band played a mesmerizing set of dreamy pop which continually shifted between glorious melodies and blazing sonic chaos.

The band's unique ability to create the musical equivalent of a tornado and still manage to pull hooks seemingly out of nowhere was highlighted during such songs as "Bell" and "Vigilante Always."

Although the band at times got slowed down by their tendency to be a tad arty, The Swirlies still managed to put on an interesting as well as entertaining set that proved that pop music needs not have barriers of any sort.

Opening the show was Caroline Records recording artists Walt Mink, who played a non-descript set of standard alternative rock. B

Earth 2's plot leaves many viewers lost in space

By Scott Williams
Associated Press

"Earth 2," NBC's new science fiction series, is set in the not-so-distant future.

It is the 23rd century. The Earth has been ravaged and despoiled and humankind, its numbers reduced to a handful, now lives in an orbiting space station.

"Hold on!" you say, twirling the rotor on your Star Trek beanie. "Is this one of those deals where everybody wears headsets, lives in tubes and blows their nose in aluminum hankies?"

Well, kind of. Debrah Farentino ("Equal Justice") plays scientist Devon Adair (say it fast three times), who's organized an interstellar expedition to an Earth-like planet, where she and like-minded colonists hope to start over.

Adair, a single mom, has a pressing, personal reason to go. Her son, Ulysses (Joey Zimmerman), is one of about 200 children wasting away from a mysterious syndrome that comes — no kidding — from living in the sterile, regulated environment of a space station. None has lived past age 9; he's 8.

"Cool!" you say. "A lifesaving mission! Rugged individualists blazing a colony out of the galactic wilderness!"

Not so fast, Space Boy. Adair has overcome six years of government resistance to the mission, but just eight hours before blastoff, her team intercepts a newscast that the expedition was destroyed.

"Hold on," you say. "These people living in tubes want to blow up the colonists? And a great deal of capital equipment in the bargain? Why didn't they just hide the car keys?"

And miss out on a space explosion for a first-act closer? "So, they get to the planet, right?"

Well, they crash, but. . . yes. And that's where "Earth 2" starts to get silly.

People who have never been outdoors or even seen the sky just saunter out of their pod and stroll around. You'd think they'd have extremely strong feelings at that moment, wouldn't you? No, they're so relaxed it's funny.

Adair must lead them on a trek halfway around the planet to set up a base for a second shipment of settlers. As an actress, the fine-boned Farentino lacks the gravitas to lead such an expedition. Still, it can't be too tough a planet. In Sunday's premiere, the deserts, foothills, forests and river valleys seem like they're about 20 feet apart.

If you think of "Earth 2" as science fiction, you'll be disappointed. These aren't 23rd century people. They're people who talk like us, think like us and act like us, only without the Winnebagos.

"Jeez," you say. "It sounds like 'Dr. Quinn, Medicine Woman.'"

Close. The writing is "plotty," setting up little emotional troughs and peaks for children and young adults always situated against Kodak-moment backgrounds.

Oh, and Farentino does a voice-over narration, with soaring horns and strings to punctuate what you're seeing.

"Cripes. Is there anything to like about the show?"

Yes. The only science fiction character in the cast is played by the wonderful Sullivan Walker (the daddy on "Where I Live"). He's a brain-wiped killer who's been reprogrammed as a spiritual, benevolent teacher.

And, while the cast is generally made up of younger, less-established actors, Adair's love interest and second in command obviously will be Clancy Brown, a fine actor who shines in roles like this.

The cinematography is superb. The creature effects are by Greg Cannon, who won an Oscar for Mrs. Doubtfire, and the production looks like the producers put a ton of money into it. But they skimped on the writing.

If you think of "Earth 2" as science fiction, you'll be disappointed. These aren't 23rd century people. They're people who talk like us, think like us and act like us, only without the Winnebagos.

"Uh-ohhhh. Do they have cute kids?"

Yes.

"A clunky robot with a radio announcer's voice?"

Um. . . yes.

"A weasely villain?"

Uh-huh.

"So it's 'Lost In Space' revisited, right?"

Man, you're tough. That show was kitschy space opera starring Guy Williams, June Lockhart, Angela Cartwright and Billy Mumy (now on "Babylon 5") as "Danger" Will Robinson.

It was merely 1965's idea of "family viewing."

"Earth 2" is merely 1994's.

Elsewhere in television ...

Despite the science fiction disappointment of "Earth 2," there's a happy surprise in store for people who tuned out Warner Bros. syndicated "Babylon 5" in its first season. The sophomore series is taking off in exciting new directions.

Promised as a deep-space Casablanca, with a five-mile-long space station serving as neutral ground for five contentious, space-faring races, "Babylon 5" has been extensively retooled. Bruce Boxleitner, formerly of "Scarecrow and Mrs. King," has been cast as the station's new commander, and the uneasy cold war between the five cultures is threatening to heat up. Other characters have been fine-tuned, and the writing is much sharper. Check it out, and you might find a space station that could give "Deep Space Nine" a run for its money.

weeks ago leading 14–3. He inserts sophomore Eric Kresser into the line-up. Next Spurrier slaps Dean in the face by making him mop up in the game, a blowout win over Southern Mississippi.

From Heisman frontrunner to third-string mop up player. Spurrier doesn't exactly take care of his players, nor does he get the most from them. People realized that maybe the NFL isn't the place for Spurrier; maybe the Swamp isn't either.

On to the weekend predictions, with the season record (13– 11) improving by the week.

Harvard 17, Yale 13 — This is what football is all about. This Ivy League contest between true student–athletes is always a spectacle worth watching. The Crimson will win this year's battle with defense.

Michigan 24, Ohio State 14 — Tyrone Wheatley will close the season on a high note. The Wolverines once again have had a disappointing season after such a good beginning. Gary Moeller should be on the hot seat, sitting right next to OSU's John Cooper.

Auburn 27, Alabama 21 — The great Tiger defense will aim to shut down Bama running back Sherman Williams. Patrick Nix to Frankie Sanders in the air will make the difference for Auburn. Coach Terry Bowden, already a hot commodity, will become the most sought–after coach by the NFL, surpassing Miami's Dennis Erickson.

can't. Louis wants to be punished," Jordan said. "Louis is a human being. He connects transgression with punishment. . . I just found the moral debate in the story fascinating."

Jordan said he doesn't really know why evil seems more interesting, though he suggests being good just isn't as much fun. "You got to make (being) good more fun. Tell Pat Robertson that," he playfully added, averring that Lucifer's story is much more interesting than any of the good angels.

"There's this drama going on down there in hell, isn't there? This weeping and gnashing of teeth. . . It's like a movie down there in hell," Jordan joked.

He returns to reality with his next movie, based on the life of Irish revolutionary Michael Collins.

But for now, he's still caught up in the vampire world. He thinks moviegoers still go bats over vampires because: "People love supernatural things, don't they? And we live in a kind of depressingly natural world, don't we? A depressingly realistic world.

"I suppose they're a bit like traditional angels and devils, aren't they? They belong to a realm of being that we'd love to imagine existed, you know. Seems like the vampire is the only mythological creature left in the modern world."

Certainly, stories no longer have prominent roles for fairies, such as Puck from Shakespeare's A Midsummer's Night Dream or the ancient Roman and Greek gods, Jordan said.

"We don't have Bacchus or any of those great characters," Jordan went on, referring to the god of revelry.

But at least Bacchus WOULD say, "I DO drink wine."

from book to screen. This is a shame since this struggle is beautifully expressed in the book and makes Louis all the more interesting.

Lestat on the other hand is more complex. He is a flippant, materialistic, romantic and sensual vampire who revels in the fact that he can seduce anyone into loving him despite his evil ways. To Lestat the world is his for the taking. Although I didn't find Cruise's performance excellent, having not given him much credit to begin with, I admit to being impressed with his work. His dramatic edge of both humor and horror was drawn out quite well. Credit here must also be given to make-up artist Stan Winston, who replaced Cruise's normally harsh tones with the soft and beautiful contours of Lestat.

While seemingly apathetic to those around him, Lestat is deeply in love with Louis, and their relationship is one filled with the passionate tension of teacher and pupil. The fact that they see the dark world so differently is what bonds them together. Unfortunately this didn't come through on screen.

In fact, much of the homoeroticism of the book was left on the cutting room floor. This is said since it is from that element that we get a clear sense of the vampire's humanistic qualities, and that which bonds us with them. We can relate to their emotions, for it is often out of a deep love for each other that they act.

But homoeroticism never makes it past the producers in Hollywood, which is a significant problem in bringing Rice's books to the screen. It is also ridiculous since one of the most intense moments in the movie was the final exchange between Armand and Louis.

This "hands off the issue" approach also raises problems in establishing the relationships of Lestat and Louis to Claudia (Kirsten Dunst), whose performance is stellar and by far the best. The fact that she is a 30-something year-old woman in an 11-year-old's body is hard to visualize without making an audience uncomfortable. Yet it is key to understanding her pain (she is in love with Louis and yet can never physically express this).

Furthermore, the movie strayed from developing the relationships of Armand, Louis and Lestat. In fact, the movie doesn't even place Lestat in the Vampire Theatre, which for the readers of the book became confusing. That triangle is the climatic point in the book, bringing Louis and Lestat's relationship to a screaming pinnacle of love and loss. I puzzle over why it was removed from the screenplay, for the scenes in Paris were the weakest and most problematic.

After talking with others (those who have read the chronicles and those who have not), it is clear to me that in order to fully understand and appreciate the movie, one must first read the book. Although Rice did write the screenplay (thankfully), two hours and 10 minutes is not enough time to go in depth into the motivations behind the characters' words and actions. Nor is it enough time to develop and explore their relationships to one another, as Rice so exquisitely does in her books. If you already understand this, the film becomes twice as intense and powerful. Without reading the book, it's hard to believe the viewer can appreciate the emotional beauty Rice so easily develops in her novels.

Well, we all know there will be a sequel, and it could very well be the sequel that clears up some of the cloudiness in Interview (since it is so with the second to the first book). However, in order for Hollywood to succeed in seducing Rice devotees in accepting their dark gift, they need to first put some bite back into their blood.

■ vampire

America's pretty-boy play a baddie.

Cruise is so effective that when he leaves the film temporarily it loses its edge, its creepy verve. But when he does come back it's a doozy, even if it's the most obvious sequel set-up since the ending of Jurassic Park.

As a counterpoint to the dashing Lestat, Brad Pitt has the tougher role. Pitt has a languished drone about him that quickly becomes insufferable; for most of the film you just wish he'd quit complaining and start sucking already. In reality, Louis can't shake off the human side of him. But the film never develops this; instead he's a weak moral center for a movie better served without one.

For all of Lestat's flair, it's really Claudia who shines in this ensemble. As portrayed by 12-year-old wonder Kirsten Dunst, Claudia is an intriguing woman-child hunting for blood and an adult female form she can never possess. When Lestat gives her "life," it's this stroke of almost sadistic event that seals her fate. Dunst manages to capture this in a face both angelic and damned; it's the primal thread of the novel that the film, for all its stylistic power, never attains on its own.

Interview With the Vampire will never be confused for a bad movie; it's too smart for that. Yet if you're looking for subtle sub-texts and the kindling of a homoerotic undercurrent, read the novel. The film is strictly kid-gloves; homoeroticism by way of "Melrose Place" (Matt would fit it quite nicely in this bunch). But make no mistake — Interview isn't the debacle everyone expected. It's finely crafted (and finely forgettable) pulp, served with heapings of style. And if the film sells its soul in the process, hey, welcome to Hollywood. B tured romance between Scarlett and the dashing Rhett Butler in the first place. In the original film, pretty much all they did was bicker back and forth endlessly, making themselves and each other and the audience miserable.

Thankfully, there wasn't too much of that in "Scarlett," but there wasn't a whole lot of excitement or chemistry between the characters either. I suppose I should congratulate actors Timothy Dalton and Joanne Whaley–Kilmer for even attempting to take over the roles that Clark Gable and Oscar–winner Vivien Leigh created — admittedly, they're a tough act to follow.

Dalton was adequate as Rhett, but unfortunately Whaley– Kilmer seemed too timid to be really effective as Scarlett. She comes across as ditsy, rather than determined, and would have been better cast as, say, the heroine's sister.

Personally, I think they should have yanked Shannen Doherty out of that Margaret Mitchell movie and cast her as a wild and appropriately feisty Scarlett. That's what this miniseries really needed in order to work: Scarlett stomping around, giving orders, and mercilessly cutting everybody down like "90210"'s Brenda on a bad hair day.

Aside from "Scarlett," the networks cranked out a variety of unexpected developments for many of TV's best–loved weekly series — a few of which I've chosen to outline here. On ABC's corny but entertaining drama "The Commish," the title character was kidnapped by none other than Barbara Mandrell as a murderous psychiatric hospital director. That's probably one of my worst fears: that I'd be tortured and brainwashed by one of country music's famed entertainers. Just play me a few of those songs, and I'd be putty in their hands within moments.

CBS' "Murphy Brown" found light–headed Corky and nerdy Miles going out on a date (with a disappointingly vague conclusion) and NBC's Frasier Crane got an unpleasant surprise visit from ex–wife Lilith right in the middle of a romantic rendezvous with his new girlfriend.

Elsewhere, NBC's John Larroquette was disturbed to learn that his long–lost daughter is "Blossom"'s Mayim Bialik (and who can blame him) and Mickey Rooney announced his candidacy for president before thousands of horrified viewers on "Late Night."

I won't get into the details of Rooney's talk show appearance, except to say that he nearly got into a fistfight with a fake ostrich — not a pretty sight. But when those precious Neilsen households are at stake, I, guess no show can afford to pull any punches, even if the well–being of an innocent (albeit phony) ostrich must be sacrificed.

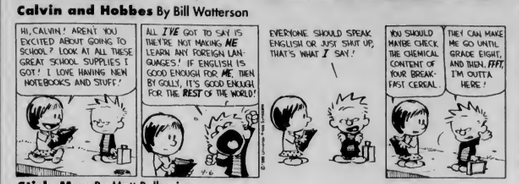
Calvin and Hobbes By Bill Watterson

THIS IS HOPELESS! HOW AM I SUPPOSED TO CREATE A DESERT SCENE IN THIS SHOE BOX WHEN I DON'T EVEN KNOW WHAT A DESERT LOOKS LIKE?
I'VE NEVER BEEN TO A DESERT! MOM AND DAD NEVER TAKE ME ANYWHERE EXCITING ON VACATIONS! IF THEY'D TAKEN ME TO A DESERT SOMETIME, I'D KNOW THIS STUFF!
WHY DON'T YOU GET OUT A BOOK?
AND GO TO ALL THAT TROUBLE? YEAH, SURE! LOOK I'M A BUSY GUY! I'VE GOT OTHER THINGS TO DO WITH MY LIFE BESIDES THIS! DO YOU KNOW?
RIGHT. RIGHT. WASTE TIME LEARNING. WHEN KNOWLEDGE IS INSTANTANEOUS!
MY TV SHOW STARTS IN 20 MINUTES. ARE YOU GOING TO HELP ME OR NOT?
NEVER MIND!

Calvin and Hobbes By Bill Watterson



HI, CALVIN! AREN'T YOU EXCITED ABOUT GOING TO SCHOOL? LOOK AT ALL THESE GREAT SCHOOL SUPPLIES I GOT! I LOVE HAVING NEW NOTEBOOKS AND STUFF!
ALL I'VE GOT TO SAY IS THEY'RE NOT MAKING ME LEARN ANY FOREIGN LANGUAGES! IF ENGLISH IS GOOD ENOUGH FOR ME, THEN BY GOLLY, IT'S GOOD ENOUGH FOR THE REST OF THE WORLD!
EVERYONE SHOULD SPEAK ENGLISH OR JUST SHUT UP, THAT'S WHAT I SAY!
YOU SHOULD MAYBE CHECK THE CHEMICAL CONTENT OF YOUR BREAKFAST CEREAL
THEY CAN MAKE ME GO UNTIL GRADE EIGHT, AND THEN, FFFT. I'M OUTTA HERE!

Minutewomen looking to backcourt for stability

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

After being picked third in the Atlantic 10 preseason poll, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team has high expectations for the upcoming season. If they are going to meet those lofty goals, the team will have to be able to rely on steady play from its backcourt.

Leading the way for the UMass guards this year will be sophomore Beth Kuzmeski. The 5-foot 7-inch Northampton native set a school record with 53 three pointers last season, shattering the old UMass single season mark of 42.

"Beth is our only pure three point threat," said Massachusetts Coach Joanie O'Brien. "She is shooting the ball well, and is better conditioned this year."

Kuzmeski, who will primarily be the off-guard, started in 18 of 28 games averaging 10.1 points per game, third on the squad. She also corralled an average of 4.1 rebounds per game, while her 33.3 percent from beyond the three point line placed her seventh in the league.

"Coach has given me the okay to shoot whenever I get a good shot," Kuzmeski said. "My job is to shoot or create. If I am shooting well, then it opens up the middle more for Octavia and Melissa."

O'Brien will look to Kuzmeski to be the team's gunner again this year.

"Beth has added a complete offensive game, but we need her to shoot the ball even more than last year," O'Brien said.

Joining Kuzmeski in the backcourt will be newcomer Sabriya Mitchell. Mitchell, a sophomore who sat out last season due to the Proposition 48 SAT requirement, should see the majority of time at the point guard position.

"Sabriya has picked things up quicker than we thought," O'Brien said. "She has a coach's mentality and she gives us that pure passer we've been looking for."

Mitchell's assets include speed and a great court sense.

"I'm very excited to get on the court," Mitchell said. "I've been waiting all year."

"Sabriya will make everyone around her better," O'Brien said of the 5-foot 3-inch guard from Newark, N.J. "We have to be patient and remember it's only her first collegiate season, but she will do more good things than make mistakes."

Also figuring to see time at the point guard position will be 5-foot 6-inch junior Tricia Hopson, a steady player who will be looked to provide leadership on the court.

The Ocean City, N.J., native, who is averaging 2.2 points a game over the last two years, is very experienced and adept at running UMass' half court offense.

"Trish and Sabriya will really complement each other. Trish is a good passer who will be counted on to come in and keep everything under control," O'Brien said.

Hopson played in all but two of the Minutewomen's games last year as backup to departed senior Maleeka Valentine.

Not to be overlooked in the whole back court equation is junior Nicole Carter. The 5-foot 8-inch junior from Philadelphia, Pa., can play at either the guard or the forward position and her versatility should help her work her way into the lineup.

COLLEGIAN FILE

Sophomore guard Beth Kuzmeski will be looked to to provide outside shooting for the Minutewomen.

"Nicole has done a lot of work and has a definite role on this team," O'Brien said.

Carter averaged 2.1 points per game and 1.2 rebounds while appearing in 18 games for the Minutewomen last year, 10 of them as a starter.

"I'm hoping to make a positive contribution to the team this year," Carter said.

"Nicole is busting her tail in practice, and we are going to find a place for her," said O'Brien.

The team's lone senior is 5-foot 8-inch Cass Anderson, who is currently winding up her fall season as the setter for the 25-4 UMass volleyball team. She will join the team after volleyball's season comes to an end.

"Cass has a unique ability to be a quiet leader," O'Brien said of the guard from Phoenix, Ariz. "She has one of the best attitudes on the team, and a special demeanor. She plays within herself and will be another three point shooter that will spell Beth."

One piece of the puzzle that will be missing from the UMass backcourt will be 5-foot 9-inch junior Kim Gregory. Gregory, who appeared in 26 games last year as one of the team's top reserves, looks to be lost for the season with an injury to her anterior cruciate ligament.

"The thing we will most about Kim is the emotions she brings to the team, and to the court," O'Brien said. "Someone is going to have to pick that up, and I don't know how something like that can be transferred."

"I don't think the full effect [of missing a season] has set in yet," Gregory said. "When they start playing, it will be harder, but I'll still be there on the bench keeping my teammates pumped up."

What kind of season will it be for the UMass backcourt?

"We have some good games in the early season," Kuzmeski said. "They'll give us a good idea of where we're at."

Tomorrow's paper will feature a preview of the A-10.

Boring, frustrating '94 Bowl matches

Anthony Guido On College Football

For some reason, this year's bowl picture is not only cloudy but disappointing. The match-ups don't figure to be exciting, but very frustrating. The bowls stink, continually holding this grand sport back.

Rose Bowl. This one will hurt the most. No. 2 Penn State must take on some Pac-10 stiff. What's worse is that it probably will be Oregon (who?), instead of decent teams like Southern Cal or Arizona.

The Big Ten needs to decide if the money of the Rose Bowl or the chance to play in a national championship game is the ultimate goal. Gee, I wonder what they'll pick.

Sugar Bowl. Alabama needs to win against Auburn and Florida (good luck) to enter the bowl as an undefeated, but then what? Florida State doesn't want to go there, so watch out for USC or a Big East chump (Syracuse or Boston College) — another simply terrible game.

Miami hopes 'Bama fails, setting up a great Orange Bowl contest. Nebraska (No. 1) vs. Miami (No.3) would be the only game worth viewing.

Cotton Bowl. Don't even think of watching this one. Texas Tech, Rice and even Baylor are all miserable teams. No quality team will play in this one, Notre Dame (not a quality team this year) might have to with its four losses.

Money talks. The top three teams in the land are Nebraska, Penn State and Alabama. If all three remain at the top, nothing can be settled on New Year's Day. Did anybody say playoffs, stop the excuses please.

Here's a very interesting bit of news from the Nov. 14 edition of the Sporting News: there is this new club forming around the nation called the Anti-ND Athletic Club. Many people have waited a long time for this.

The club is design for people who hate Notre Dame athletics, mostly the football team. The group buys tickets to ND road games from the home school, promising to cheer for that school. They cheer for anyone, at anyplace, at anytime, as long as its against the Irish. Sounds good.

By the way, for all those interested, send a self-addressed envelope and one dollar to: the Anti-ND Athletic Club, P.O. Box 31822, Chicago, IL. 60631. The club will send all sign- up information.

What are you thinking? Why does Florida coach Steve Spurrier make such crazy moves. To bench quarterback Terry Dean was bad enough; then he sat Danny Wuerffel down in a game a couple of Massachusetts vs. Turkish Junior National Team

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will take the floor for their second exhibition game tonight when they take the floor against the Turkish Junior National Team.

The Turkish team is currently touring the United States and is in the midst of games against Atlantic 10 opponents.

It has not fared well so far. The team was blown out on back-to-back nights, losing 72-50 to George Washington on Nov. 11, followed by a 67-51 loss to St. Bonaventure the next night. West Virginia continued the trend, pounding them 80-52. They played Duquesne last night.

The game is the second exhibition game of the season for the Minutemen. On the strength of a 28-point, 13-rebound performance by senior Lou Roe, the Minutemen defeated Marathon Basketball 94-83 last week.

UMass will enter this season with its highest ranking ever. Both the Associated Press and the Coaches' Polls have the Minutemen at No. 3, trailing top-ranked Arkansas and No. 2 North Carolina in both polls.

Tonight's match will be UMass' final tune-up before the regular season, as the Minutemen open their season next Friday when they take on No. 1 Arkansas in the Tipoff Classic at the Springfield Civic Center.

Tickets are still available for tonight's game at the Curry Hicks Cage ticket office with an activity card and student ID.

On the air: Tonight's game will be broadcast on WHMP 99.3 FM with George Miller and former UMass basketball Coach Jack Leaman calling the action.

Rivera shining in sophomore season

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

Even a mild fan of the University of Massachusetts volleyball team has probably come to realize that the words "impact" and "Giza Rivera" go hand in hand.

Whether one is talking about what the sophomore has accomplished in her very first year in the program or is simply describing the fear-instilling collision that is imminent when the native of Toa Alta, Puerto Rico, is being set up for a kill.

Rivera, who has been in the United States for two years, came to UMass with the intention of playing under Coach Bonnie Kenny, although she was ineligible her freshman year due to Proposition 48's SAT requirement.

Rivera excelled on the Puerto Rican junior National Team before coming over to the United States, but despite her previous achievements, the outside hitter admits to a little trouble in adjusting to life in America.

"Last year was hard because it was the first time in my life I was away from my family," she said. "Coming here was a hard decision to make. I knew I'd be experiencing a whole new lifestyle. That first year here was difficult. I was scared."

It sure did not seem like it. In her first semester, Rivera made the Dean's List and took care of all her other academic requirements so she could join the team this year.

"With time, volleyball has made things easier," Rivera said. "I felt like my life, which had changed so dramatically, was more complete. I balanced both my academics and the sport."

And she did it well. As a rookie, Rivera led the team with 429 kills — averaging 4.42 kills per game. And perhaps even more amazingly, Rivera ranked second in the Atlantic 10 in kills per game, sixth in hitting percentage (.263), eighth in digs per game (3.05) and ninth in aces per game.

But Rivera will have none of that. The biggest thing on her mind right now is the upcoming Atlantic 10 tournament in Duquesne, where the Minutewomen will face West Virginia in the opening round Friday. Rivera said her team stands a good chance, as long as it does the things it has in the past to get them to where they are now.

"I'm very proud of my team," she said. "It seemed everything was against us this season, with the whole Rachel [Sky] situation and the loss of Cass [Anderson] for a while there.

"But what has been so important is the fact that our whole team has contributed. Our bench has always done the job for us. We're definitely ready for the upcoming tournament. For one thing, we're familiar with the court because we just returned from a match with Duquesne(a 3-1 win).

"We've been waiting for this tourney all season long, and I'm confident we'll be successful. We know what it's going to take," Rivera said.

She credits much of her success to Kenny, who Rivera claimed has helped her to become a better volleyball player.

"I've learned so much from Coach Kenny," said the ex- silver medalist. "She did an excellent job with the team this year. Her discipline has paid off in the long run. I never knew I was capable of improving myself the way that I did.

"I've improved so many facets of my game. When I return to Puerto Rico to play [temporarily] next summer, people will notice the difference in my game."

Rivera also looks up to senior setter Cass Anderson.

"I really admire Cass for her composure," Rivera said. "She is a very mature, experienced player. We're really going to miss her next year."

Interestingly enough, Rivera is from the same town as Edgar Padilla, who plays for the men's basketball team. Ironically, the two have been in the same kindergarten class, elementary school, high school and now college.

They were separated for long periods of time, however, due to each other's touring with national teams. Both played basketball in Cuba as 12-year-olds on their respective national teams.

One little known fact is it was none other than Padilla who drew Rivera to UMass. He told a friend of Rivera's volleyball ability, and forwarded a tape of Rivera playing volleyball through this friend to Kenny, who was impressed, to say the least.

"I'm very optimistic about the future of this team," Rivera said. "We've got a strong nucleus of young players, so I am very excited, not only for down the road, but for now. We are going to do whatever we have to do to be successful. I'm not going to graduate until I get a championship."

George Washington upsets Syracuse

By William Kates

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — Kwame Evans had a career-high 29 points as George Washington scored the first 12 points of overtime to upset No. 12 Syracuse 111-104 Wednesday night in the opening round of the Preseason NIT.

G. Washington	111
Syracuse	104

Syracuse's Michael Lloyd tied the game 93-93 at the regulation buzzer, banking in a 3-pointer after spinning off a defender. Lucious Jackson also hit two long 3-pointers in the final minute as Syracuse erased a nine-point deficit over the final 2:01.

The game was played at Manley Field House because the Carrier Dome was set up for this weekend's football game. The Orangemen hadn't played a home game at Manley since the 1979-80 season when they closed it with a 52-50 loss to Georgetown to snap a 57-game home winning streak.

Syracuse was 66-2 against non-conference opponents over the last six seasons, both losses coming to Notre Dame.

Five players finished in double figures for the Colonials, who advance to Friday's quarterfinals against Canisius, an 81-78 winner over Pennsylvania.

Evans and Nimbo Hammonds combined for five of George Washington's seven second-half 3-pointers as the Colonials pulled away from Syracuse, shutting down its top two scorers, Lawrence Moten and John Wallace.

Moten finished with 21 points and Wallace 17, but they scored just 14 points in the final 25 minutes after combining for 26 in the first half.

Hammonds, who was 3-for-8 from 3-point range, finished with 22 points before fouling out with 5:32 to play and his team leading 75-71. Evans bettered his previous high of 25 points, going 4-for-6 from 3-point range. George Washinton was 9-of-18 on 3-pointers as a team.

Antoine Hart added 23 points for George Washington, while Vaughn Jones had 18 and 7-foot-1 freshman Alexander Koul 13.

Lloyd finished with 27 points in his major college debut, scoring all but two after halftime. Jackson finished with 17. Syracuse trailed 19-10 early in the first half, but used a pressing defense to build a 35-28 lead with 5:16 to go in the first half. George Washington scored 13 of the final 19 points of the half to make it 41-41 at halftime.

Virginia 83 – Old Dominion 80

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. (AP) - An old friend resurfaced Wednesday night just in time to prevent Virginia from its second consecutive opening-day embarrassment.

Cory Alexander celebrated his return to the lineup with a career-high 29 points to lift the 14th-ranked Cavaliers to an 83-80 victory over pesky Old Dominion in the first round of the Preseason NIT.

"It was just good to get out there and play again, believe me," said Alexander, a redshirt junior guard.

Two years ago, Alexander led Virginia and was fifth in the Atlantic Coast Conference by averaging 18.8 points. But he missed almost the entire 1993-94 season after breaking an ankle in the first half of the Cavaliers' opener against Connecticut. Virginia went on to lose that game by 41 points, the Cavaliers' worst loss in the history of University Hall.

Forum focuses on Schoolfield murder, injustice

Police brutality, racism discussed in Morrill Auditorium

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

The judicial system in America is corrupt and, unless you have money, it is not going to work for you, according to Jamie Schoolfield-Lyles, the sister of a 20-year-old Black youth who was shot and killed by a police officer in Springfield last February.

Schoolfield-Lyles spoke at a forum entitled "Justice for Ben Schoolfield," last night at the University of Massachusetts Morrill Science Auditorium. She stopped several times to collect herself as she gave an emotional account of the judicial handling of her brother's murderer, Officer Donald Brown. Approximately 100 people attended.

"If Benjamin had shot Donald Brown, we would not be having this conversation — he would be in jail," Schoolfield-Lyles said.

Brown shot and killed Benjamin Schoolfield on Feb. 7. Brown said he thought that Schoolfield was in a stolen vehicle, which he was not, Schoolfield-Lyles said. He proceeded to shoot at him from a distance while Schoolfield operated the vehicle at a slow speed.

Five people witnessed the crime, but none were asked to testify in front of the all-White jury that decided not to indict Brown.

Upon Brown's return to the force, after getting off free of all charges, the police department allegedly held a party for him for "a job well done," said Chelan Jenkins, president of the Arise for Social Justice organization.

Springfield Mayor Robert Markel, the Springfield Police Department and the NAACP, all came under fire as the case was discussed.

"[The police] sent his mother a poem, line after line, about how they killed her son and signed it 'Your Honorable Springfield Police Department,'" Chelan said. "Then she began to receive harassing phone

People gather, voice opinions on system

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

Last night's "Justice for Ben Schoolfield" forum featured highly-charged speakers who led their audience, many of whom were from out-of state, into a similar emotional state.

Reactions to the meeting for many were energetically positive; several people remained talking at the auditorium even after the event had ended.

"I think that the most important thing people should get out of this meeting is that we need to fight back against the system," Bard College student Tracy Balkeley said. "Solidarity is the key."

"It's good that people were able to generalize from the Ben Schoolfield experience," Brown University student Jamie Macbeth said. "We have to build from people's anger so that the next time it happens, we can destroy the confidence powerful people have in destroying minorities."

Another factor in the success of the evening was that not everyone in attendance was a student, thus offering other diverse perspectives.

"Every week we read about cases of police brutality or racial attacks in Providence," Rhode Island union organizer Jesse Sharkey said. "That's why the coalition fighting for Ben Schoolfield is so important."

"What makes me feel bad is that I'm 37 years old and my generation's offspring are being shot down in their prime," Springfield's Lauretta Kynard said.

Although outraged as well, the speakers who had inspired the impassioned responses were clear in their ultimate mission. "We need to remain focused," Student Trustee Al Lizana said. "The main goal is to receive justice for Ben."

"It was nice to see so many people come out," Jamie Schoolfield-Lyles said. "[The police] need to know they're not going to get away with this crime."

English department wins accolades for faculty's works

By Kelly Spang

University of Massachusetts English professor and poet won the 1994 National Book Award Wednesday.

James Tate, a 24-year veteran of the University, won the poetry award for Worshipful Company of Fletchers (Ecco Press).

Tate, whose poems capture the everyday and the otherworldly, said he sometimes rewrites poems 50 times, but other times is satisfied after a single draft.

"I'm honored," Tate said. "It's wonderful when your peers recognize your work in a special way."

The award carries a $10,000 prize and a bronze commemorative sculpture.

Tate has published 10 previous collections of poems, winning the 1992 Pulitzer Prize for Poetry and the William Carlos Williams Award for his work, Selected Poems.

In 1989 he was named a Distinguished University Professor by the UMass Board of Trustees for achievements in his field.

Another UMass English professor, John Edgar Wideman, was also among more than 740 nominees for the 1994 National Book Award. Wideman was selected as candidate for his nonfiction work Fatheralong: A Meditation on Fathers, Sons, Race and Society (Pantheon Books).

"The book is about my family, race and history," he said. "It was inspired by a trip I took to South Carolina with my dad."

Wideman, a member of the UMass faculty since 1986, won the American Book Award for Fiction in 1990 and PEN/Faulkner Award for fiction.

Wideman gave the graduation address at last year's commencement ceremony.

Both Tate and Wideman teach creative writing in the master of fine arts program.

"These professors have achieved quite an honor," Stephen Clingman, chair of the English Department, said. "The University should be advertising this. It can only benefit the University and its students."

There will be a reception for Tate and Wideman Nov. 29 at 4 p.m. in Memorial Hall for both authors to read from their works. The event will be free and open to the public.

Clingman said the reception will celebrate not only the success of Tate and Wideman but also the English Department and its many distinguished faculty members over the years.

How We Die: Reflections on Life's Final Chapter, Surgeon Sherwin B. Nuland's meditation on death, won the National Book Award for nonfiction, beating out Wideman and three other finalists, including a controversial book about Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas.

Much of the interest in this year's awards had centered on Strange Justice: The Selling of Clarence Thomas, by two Wall Street Journal reporters. Authors Jill Abramson and Jane Mayer discuss Thomas' appointment to the high court despite sexual harassment allegations by his former aide, Anita Hill.

The Black Panthers still alive and headed into the 1990s

By Hernan Rozemberg
Collegian Staff

On the evening of Oct. 16 the University of Massachusetts was honored with the visit of a long-standing Black Panther Party (BPP) member in the figure of Safiya B. Alston. The event was part of a continuing series of events in Prisoner Awareness Week, and was also presented by the Social Thought and Political Economy department's "Forum on Racism" series.

The meeting was opened by the presentation of a film of the Black Panther Party as part of the PBS "Eyes On The Prize" television production. In it, there is a documented description of the assassinations of Black Panther leaders Fred Hampton and Mark Clark at the hands of the Chicago Police Department, in close cooperation with the FBI.

At the conclusion of the video presentation, Alston approached the microphone in tears. Seeing the dead corpses of Hampton and Clark, for whom she had dedicated so much of her life to, had made Alston very emotional indeed, a feeling that she did not relinquish for the rest of her talk.

Alston, a New York native, started helping out the BPP out of its Harlem office in 1968, and actually joined it the following year, after personally experiencing police harassment and brutality. She was arrested and convicted in 1975, and spent nearly nine years in prison until she was released in 1983, she said.

Alston next proceeded to examine the Party's past historical objectives retrospectively in relation to the contemporary society. This was done by a thorough analysis of the original Ten-Point Program of the Black Panther Party.

"The ten-point platform has not yet been achieved, and the struggle will continue until we achieve it," she said, warning anyone who might have thought that the Panthers had been extinct. If the struggle has actually dwindled, this has been because of the continual mental and physical abuse of American Blacks, which produced "the slaughter of over 50 million Black people," according to Alston.

After relating the original intentions and goals of the original BPP that was founded in 1966, the speaker concentrated on delineating the current status of the Panthers. To begin with, the new name of the group is called the Black Panther Newspaper Committee, after the reprinting of the Black Panther picked up again in 1991.

New objectives of the Panthers today include confronting Black homelessness and hunger, tackling the dilemma of Black-on-Black violence seen in street gangs, and most importantly, helping out Blacks in jails who are not "criminals" but rather "political prisoners," according

Toy drive and raffle for local area tots in memory of child

By Emily Marino
Collegian Staff

Karen Dunford is giving the season of giving heightened significance through a toy drive and raffle. With the help of the Northampton Survival Center, Dunford hopes to collect toys and raise funds for local children, in memory of her daughter, Melissa.

Dunford, who is now 34-years-old, said that her father sexually abused her throughout her childhood, and impregnated her when she was in high school.

Dunford is currently in the beginning stages of suing her father; she claims when the baby girl was born in Dunford's Cape Cod home, her father sexually abused and then killed the infant, and beat Dunford in the process.

A police investigation is on-going.

Since the death of her daughter, Dunford has obtained a restraining order against her father.

Dunford has since received counseling, and said that she is sponsoring this toy drive and raffle in memory of Melissa to help other children.

"I guess I was having a hard time dealing with my daughter's death," said Dunford. "I wanted to do something for other children in memory of my daughter."

Dunford called the Northampton Survival Center and volunteered to organize both the toy drive and raffle. She then called and stopped by local businesses, stores, and restaurants to ask for donations for raffle prizes.

"I've done a lot of leg work," said Dunford, who said that help was not hard to enlist. "It was really easy,

Role of women in religion discussed at debate at Smith College

Ireland and Rankin try to hash out issues

By Kathryn Silver
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON — "The relationship between feminism and the bible has been going on for over one hundred years and has consistently been a heated issue," said Susan Burke, Dean of Admissions at Smith College.

Burke was the moderator of a debate between Patricia Ireland, president of the National Organization for Women, (NOW), and John Rankin, president of the Theological Education Institute.

The discussion titled "Feminism and the Bible: Do They Share any Common Ground?", drew a crowd that filled the Sweeny Concert Hall at Smith College last Wednesday night.

Burke opened the debate by asking the audience to challenge themselves to re-examine truths about religion and feminist movement. She then introduced the two speakers.

After a brief background on the feminist movement, Ireland approached the issue at hand — religion.

"Religious groups today tend to use the mantle of religion on a political ground," she said. "For example when Roe vs. Wade came out, a lot of [evangelistic] Christians rallied together to control sexuality. The church frightened people into not having abortions. What frightens me is the use of violence by people who call themselves religious," Ireland said.

> "[W]hen Roe vs. Wade came out, a lot of [evangelistic] Christians rallied together to control sexuality. The church frightened people into not having abortions.
> –Patricia Ireland

Ireland concluded her opening statement with a question to Minister Rankin. She said, "Is it ever appropriate to use violence to enforce religious view?"

Before answering her question, Rankin gave his own background information on the Bible and the book of Genesis.

"As a biblical Christian, to take the Bible into its own terms is to understand creation, sin and redemption," he said.

"Only Genesis has a positive view of women," Rankin said in an effort to compare Christianity to other westernized religions.

"I am opposed unalterably to the use of violence," he said in answer to Ireland's question. "If we condescend to violence and force, then we are not acting as Christians."

The panelists were then allowed time to ask questions of each other without interruption by the moderator.

Ireland pushed first. She criticized religion as a political tool, and attempted to get Rankin to answer for the actions of religious extremists.

"I have been literally kicked in the shins by people calling themselves clergy," Ireland said. "You (Rankin) may not advocate violence, but you must answer for the religious Right if you are to call yourself a representative."

"Those who kick in the shins are hypocrites," Rankin responded. He went on to give examples of non-violent protests that he had been involved in, including a protest outside of an abortion clinic in Brookline.

Marriage and the church

The next issue to arise was that of the church's position on marriage.

Ireland made several statements concerning violence in the home. "Violence against women is more prevalent at home than on the streets," she said. "Religion and tradition have advocated husbands using violence to keep their wives in line."

Rankin answered by giving his definition of marriage.

"Marriage is a 100 percent to 100 percent relationship," he said. "You give 100 percent and receive 100 percent; there is no discrimination between man and woman. The church advocated mutual submission. Because Christ has given everything and set woman free then she is free to submit to Christ."

"The church seems to identify the man as the leader," Ireland was quick to respond. "We don't all have the ideal man, however, who is going to say 'hey, honey, I'm setting you free.'"

After a brief recess, a long line formed of people ready to ask questions of the speakers. Most answers, however, only reiterated the points already made by Ireland and Rankin.

At the conclusion of the debate informational materials on both NOW and the Theological Educational Institute were made available to the audience.

Inflation under control stocks still fall

NEW YORK (AP) — A technical selloff in bonds pushed stocks lower, even after the financial markets got good news on inflation and the economy.

The 30-year bond was down 13-32 point. Its yield, which rises when prices fall, stood at 8.15 percent, up from 8.09 percent Wednesday.

Bonds fell amid heavy hedge-fund selling, despite a Philadelphia Federal Reserve report that its index of regional business activity fell to 30.5 in November from 33.2 last month. The bank's index of prices paid fell to 52.3 from 53.6, and prices received declined to 20.1 from 22.7.

All of those figures indicated good growth with moderate inflation, analysts said.

The survey also showed increases in employment and the average work week, and most indications of future economic activity rose. Those components were taken as a signal that inflation might be looming, and analysts worried that they could encourage the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates further.

RESCHEDULING OF FINAL EXAMS ON OFFICIAL SNOW DAYS

In order to reschedule final examinations in case of snow, 7 alternate exam periods have been devised. They are 6:30 pm and 9:45 pm each exam day. The use of these alternate periods in the event of closings is outlined below. In addition, the academic calendar includes Saturday, December 24 as an official snow day in the event that the University is closed Dec 23. This policy goes into effect ONLY if the University is officially closed. The snow day "hot-line" is 545-3420. If the University is open, all exams are expected to take place as scheduled. Each faculty member should inform his or her class at the first meeting of the date and location of the rescheduled final exam in the event of a snow day. All rescheduled exams will be held in the same location as published in the final exam schedule.

If the University is closed until 11:00 am:

Correction

In Wednesday's Collegian, the story on the forum discussing racism in the criminal justice system, the Maoist International Movement was also present at the forum along with the Alliance for Student Power. Individuals as well as representatives from the two groups were present.

Also, the president of the Haitian American Student Association was misidentified in an article regarding military intervention in Haiti Wednesday. The president is Magalie Lamour.

In yesterday's Collegian, the front page story on the Massachusetts National Guard was incorrect. The Guard only offers free tuition to state colleges and universities within the Commonwealth.

The Collegian regrets the errors.

calls saying that he deserved it."

The blatant racism involved and the fact that Brown had violated standard procedure and was not reprimanded brought emotions to a peak.

Many Springfield residents voiced their concerns about racism within the Springfield Police Department, and the lack of communication with the community.

"The system protects and serves some people and does damage to others," said Student Trustee Al Lizana. Lizana detailed a few of his own personal experiences with police violence while growing up in Springfield.

Not only did Lizana discuss unnecessary police violence toward minorities in Springfield, but also brought up other deviant activities the police engage in, such as drug sales.

"They're doing stuff that they're supposed to prevent from happening," Lizana said.

Groups from different cities, including Providence, New York, Boston, a large group from Springfield and members of the Amherst community, all came in support of the coalition to indict Officer Brown for murder.

The Ben Schoolfield Coalition promoted a mass picket that will be held on Feb. 7 in front of Springfield Police Station.

"My mother still cries every day," Schoolfield-Lyles said. "We are not forgetting this. My brother did not die in vain."

The grand prize is a brand new 15-speed mountain bike, said Dunford. Other prizes include a $50 gift certificate to the East Side Grill, Bucci hair salon, La Cazuela restaurant, the Depot and the Florence Flower Shop. Tickets will be for sale for $1 each at the beginning of next week.

"I'm also seeking people from UMass to help buy a bunch of raffle tickets to give away to friends or as gifts," said Dunford.

In addition, Dunford is looking for toy donations appropriate for infants to children up to age 12. The toys will be stored in a room at the Northampton Survival Center and distributed during the first two weeks of December. Families will be allowed to visit the Survival Center and pick out toys, according to Dunford.

Toy donations may be dropped off at the Northampton Survival Center, 265 Prospect St., near the YMCA. Anyone interested in helping with the sale of raffle tickets or the toy drive can contact Karen Dunford at the Survival Center, 586-6564.

WOMEN making WAVES

Compiled by Colleen D. Shanahan

Women take classroom priority

Peggy Orenstein, author of The Schoolgirl Scandal is making boys take an interest in women's issues.

"Teachers have to think creatively so that boys become as interested in women's contribution to history as girls are."

Orenstein spent the 1992-93 school year interviewing eighth-grade girls in two Northern California middle schools and tracking their progress both in and out of the classroom.

"I write mostly about issues that affect women, so it was exciting to step back and see the antecedents of those issues and how the next generation is being formed."

The violence continues

Pauline Zile, 24, of West Palm Beach, Fla, is being charged with the beating death of her 7-year-old daughter Christina Holt. Zile alleged that her second-grade daughter was abducted from a Fort Lauderdale flea market bathroom during a mother-daughter outing.

For days Zile pleaded hysterically on TV for the return of her daughter while authorities searched in vain. Zile finally admitted she had concocted the story. Christina Holt's body was found in a five foot deep grave.

Zile said, "I pray that everyone who ever knew and will know me will forgive me for not being a strong person."

Life is a highway

More and more women are selling cars for a living and their customers like it, a leading automotive marketing firm reports. Women sales representatives had higher overall scores than men in JD Power and Associates' 1994 survey. Also, women are more likely to want to buy cars from women, the firm said in it's company newsletter.

"There are certain elements that a female salesperson scores stronger on," said Tony Cohen, market analyst at the Agoura Hills, CA firm. "The way you are greeted, sincerity, concerns for your needs."

Sex, lifestyle and survey results

Here's how almost 1000 undergraduate women responded to a Glamour survey about their lives in the most recent academic year.

77 percent of women hold a paying job, and 58 percent of women have volunteered more than 20 hours to a nonprofit cause. 37 percent of women have had unsafe sex, while 21 percent of women have been HIV tested. 22 percent of women have had sex when they did not want to, and 21 percent of those women would classify the incident as rape.

Role models

When asked which living woman they admire most, more than one in four women said their mother or grandmother. Hillary Rodham Clinton was first runner-up with one in ten votes.

Kaplan and marines cooperate to raise money

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — KAPLAN, known for its academic test preparation, is now sponsoring a physical test — a ten kilometer charity race.

KAPLAN, the nation's largest test preparation company, is sponsoring a race this Sunday to help raise money for the Toys for Tots program.

Refreshments and prizes will be awarded to the top three runners in the men's and women's divisions.

Toys for Tots, the 47-year-old charity which gives toys to needy children for Christmas, collected almost 20,000 toys last year for the northeastern states, said Sgt. Major Virgil Brandon. Brandon is the inspector and instructor for the reserve Marine headquarters in Worcester and director of the northeastern Toys for Tots campaign.

Toys for Tots is run by the U.S. Marine Corp Reserves, Brandon said. Campaign organizers said they hope to double last year's efforts by collecting 35,000 to 40,000 toys.

"No child should be without a toy at Christmas," said Dean Graziano, a regional director for KAPLAN. "The Toys for Tots program and KAPLAN have a lot in common, we both try to make people's futures a bit brighter."

There is a $2 registration fee which will go to the Toys for Tots program. The fee will be collected from 9-10 a.m. before the race.

Anyone is eligible to run the race, and running is also optional. People are biking, roller-blading, even wheel chairing through the race. The prizes will only be awarded to those who run the race, said Graziano.

According to Graziano, first prize is a free KAPLAN course which can be transferred for college credit. Second prize is a $50 gift certificate for the University of Massachusetts Store in the Campus Center. Third prize is a $25 gift certificate for Delivery Express Food Services.

"I work with children," said Brandon. "This was another way for me to do what I enjoy, working with children."

"It's something I'd like to do more of," said Graziano.

Current peace efforts in Middle East hollow

By Juan Jose Chacon Quiros de Quetazacoatl
Collegian Staff

After the famous handshake between Yasser Arafat and Yitzhak Rabin, it seemed to everyone in the West that peace would finally come to the Middle East. It was yesterday in Herter Hall that a different perspective on this agreement was discussed.

Maxim Ghilan, editor of Israel and Palestine Political Report and a leading member of the International Jewish Peace Union, spoke on "Peace without Justice: the Israeli- Palestinian peace process."

Ghilan, an Israeli, was not allowed into Israel under the Likud government since he had been campaigning for peace with the Palestinians and other Arabs. However, Ghilan believes that the current effort for peace is hollow. "Everybody is lying to you when they say the peace process is working."

According to Ghilan, this is not a peace between Israelis and Palestinians. "It's a peace of the government, of the rich and of the powerful but not of the people and that's why it is bound to fail," Ghilan said.

He referred to Gaza as a "Ghetto" where "the occupying power has total control of everything and the West Bank a "colonial situation." In Ghilan's view, the peace accords have effectively created "enclosed bantustans."

Ghilan believes that this agreement has done more harm to Israelis than to Palestinians, considering the fact that Palestinians were already in a precarious situation before the agreement.

"People don't agree. . . they started to back Hamas and the Jihad," Ghilan said. Forty-five percent of the people in Gaza and 25 percent in the West Bank are said to back Hamas. For Ghilan this people have no choice because "you cannot accept a peace in the basis of injustice."

Ghilan criticized the Oslo Agreements since they create a situation where everything has to be approved by the Israelis. "It was a capitulation [of the PLO]," Ghilan said.

According to him, both sides share some of the blame for the difficulties in creating a stronger peace. On one hand, the Palestinians have not got their act together in the creation of institutions that could handle an influx of aid funds.

However, Ghilan stressed the fact that even if that had happened, the aid monies were prevented from flowing to Palestine by countries like Japan, Israel and the West. According to Ghilan, the aid is needed to improve the quality of life of the Palestinians. "When you have no hope, there's no problem in fighting." In that sense he praised Hamas for "developing a broad based system of social aid."

Another important issue for the Palestinians has been the uses given to arriving funds. Ghilan harshly criticized the Israeli government for directing some of those funds to infrastructure projects. He explained how those projects will just be recreating existing infrastructure and therefore are useless.

"Creating a network of small enterprises" with those funds is what Ghilan thinks should be done in order to create some prosperity for the Palestinians. Ghilan said that right now the Palestinians are "contained, controlled and getting poorer."

Ghilan strongly criticized the way the conflict has shaped Israeli society. He said the country's economy was based in a "military-entrepreneur complex" that benefitted from war. In his view, the defense sector uses the U.S. military aid for the production of weapons made with inputs from United States and therefore recycles the money back to the U.S. economy.

In addition to that, Ghilan stressed how the extraordinary success of Israel in war has created an arrogant population. "Total success brings total egoism. . . There is a lot of egoism in Israeli society, it's unhealthy, it has too much to eat and not everybody is eating," he said.

During an extended answer and question period, Ghilan asked people in the audience to provide specific ideas about solutions that could be found to end the dispute. He closed by giving some directives that he believes would improve the situation in Palestine and be the basis for real peace: funds for the creation of small shops, free elections, the creation of a Palestinian currency and a Central Bank, and finally, negotiations between the United States and Hamas.

Indictment charges attempted assassination of Clinton

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Colorado man accused of an assault-rifle attack on the White House last month was indicted Thursday on a new charge of trying to assassinate President Clinton. Francisco Martin Duran, who pleaded innocent, could face up to life in prison if convicted.

U.S. Attorney Eric Holder said prosecutors plan to prove that Duran intended to kill the president when he allegedly fired about 29 rounds from a semiautomatic rifle at the White House from a public sidewalk.

Clinton was in the White House at the time of the Oct. 29 attack. The mansion was struck by several gunshots, but nobody was hurt.

UMass, Mexican agency to build telescope

BOSTON (AP) — Massachusetts and Mexican officials signed an agreement Thursday to build a $46 million telescope described as the largest of its kind.

The large-millimeter wave telescope, which will use radio waves to probe the universe, will be built at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst during the next several years. It will be sent to Mexico when it is finished.

The telescope, with a diameter of 50 meters, will help astronomers study a wide range of subjects, from planet surfaces to distant galaxies. It is being developed in partnership with the Mexican National Institute for Astrophysics, Optics and Electronics.

Northern Ireland peace efforts in limbo

DUBLIN, Ireland (AP) — Weeks after being hailed as a hero for helping bring about an IRA cease-fire, Prime Minister Albert Reynolds resigned Thursday in a scandal over a priest accused of child molestation.

His departure left lawmakers stunned, the government facing a potentially tortuous road to repair, and prospects for the Northern Ireland peace process uncertain.

"In life. . . you can't win them all," a grim-looking Reynolds told a hushed parliament as lawmakers were about to take a no-confidence vote on his coalition government.

A judge whose appointment precipitated the crisis resigned several hours later. A few days ago his resignation might have saved the government, but by Thursday the damage was beyond repair and all parties agreed Reynolds was right to step down.

Chic And Elegant Ambiance Made For Two At Martini's

By MIN CHOI and ELLIOTT DELOACH
Staff Writers

Martini's, the restaurant recently established at 5 Bridge St., is Rich in character and history, and provides a unique blend of fine atmosphere and delicious feasts. It was our first visit to this elegant restaurant, and we were pleasantly surprised by the fine Italian and French cuisine, as well as the breathtaking decor. Both the menu and the scenery offer a variety of flavor, with personal touches of the owners' native Sweden and Turkey.

The owners, Steve and Nuray Ozcelik, have provided for their guests exquisite and plush furnishings in order to heighten the dining experience. Mr. Ozcelik hails from Sweden, where his family has wined and dined families for generations in their own hotel and restaurant. There he learned from his family to prepare unique specialty dishes with fish, beef and pastas. Mrs. Ozcelik, a Deerfield native, has garnished Martini's interior with treasures from her own family's collection of decorations from Turkey.

We knew absolutely nothing of this couple and their restaurant before our visit. In fact, we drove past the unassuming restaurant before we realized we had missed it. For those headed there, if you have passed the railroad trestle, you have gone too far. Parking is a delicate process, and a compact car may prove to be a disaster.

On our way to the door, we noticed the patio, a fine well-lit place, perfect for those breezy summer and balmy fall evenings. We were then greeted by the attractive matre d', who offered us a choice between the patio and a table inside. To fully appreciate our first visit, we chose to be seated in a cozy table for two next to the window.

We promptly received a wine list offering an exquisite selection of white and red table wines. After a quick glance at our checking balances, we graciously declined. We opted to skip an appetizer as well and dove straight into the scrumptious entrees.

The bountiful selections made choosing nearly impossible, yet we finally were able to settle on our dishes: chicken orange marsala and grilled swordfish. While we both dreamed of larger servings, the presentation, as well as the flavor, were excellent.

The grilled swordfish ($14.95) invoked images of a mariner's delicate preparation of a first meal at home after a semester at Amherst. The small but tender cut was prepared atop a generous mound of linguine accompanied by wonderfully cooked vegetables, including sauteed zucchini and summer squash.

The chicken orange marsala ($12.95) offered a slice of chicken breast smothered in a divine blend of wild mushrooms and peppers garnished in a unique, delectable Marsala wine sauce. The chicken was fantastic, and the orange marsala was both wonderfully sweet and smooth. While the angel hair pasta was less striking, the main entree more than made up for it.

The house salad was comprised of leafy greens with chick peas, carrots and red cabbage. The dressings were splendid, offering a delicate homemade touch. We sampled the creamy gorgonzola, similar to blue cheese, and the house Italian.

What was so impressive about Martini's, however, was not so much the food, which was in itself quite excellent, but the lush, lavish decor of the restaurant itself. The paintings and tapestries that adorned the walls were both contemporary and classic, exotically Asian and yet distinctly European.

It was only after we had left our seats and were out the door when we were stopped by Mrs. Ozcelik, who gave us a quick history on the extravagant furnishings, while making sure the evenings experiences were satisfying. Every object is an original imported from the Mr. Ozcelik's family hotel in Sweden or handed down through generations of Mrs. Ozcelik's Turish family, she explained.

If you decide to go, you might bump into us because we will surely be back. While enjoying Martini's wonderful food be sure to get a peek at a century-old ornamented clock or some of the original prints that decorate the walls. You may be surprised.

to Alston. The emphasis of work is still in local communities.

The Panthers of today want to lend support to and provide "human contact" to young Black prisoners; according to Alston, 85 percent of Blacks in prisons are between the ages of 18 and 25. By doing this, however, the movement today does not want "the cult of personality" that was present thirty years ago, said Alston.

She further explained the dehumanizing process that imprisoned people go through; the psychological oppression that they are embedded with does not allow for normal human reintroduction into society, after getting out of jail.

While in jail, "Blacks are struggling from within the belly of the beast" which coerces them into a slow, perpetual, and inescapable process of transformation — "what do you expect to come out of prison but walking time bombs?" firmly asked Alston. Overall, Alston said, "if you don't support the BPP, at least support the issue of dealing with people as human beings."

Reknown American Indian activist Ward Churchill will be speaking on Saturday Nov. 19, in the Campus Center.

Getting even with Magic Head

My latest roommate has no arms and legs, and up until a couple of weeks ago he had no hair.

His name is Magic Head, and we adopted him at the Dairy Mart in south Amherst, where he was on sale for $3.99. He has become the center of attention in our apartment as quickly as he has grown hair, and I am jealous.

David Copeland

Magic Head is one of those imitation Chia Pets that has grass seed implants which allow him to grow "hair" in almost any condition. So I am not jealous of the attention that Magic Head has been getting, but I am jealous of the fact that he now has more hair than I do.

I have been slowly going bald since my twelfth birthday, so that means that for the last nine years I have been clogging up drains, making a mess of hair brushes and taking Hair Club For Men commercials more seriously than someone my age should.

About the time I started going bald there was a joyous morning when a fashion columnist predicted on the "Today" show that baldness would soon be a stylish trend. Eight years later I'm still waiting for this joyous occasion.

There are, of course, ways around baldness, but most of them seem humiliating. I never understood why people wore toupees, because everybody is by now trained to pick out these unnatural looking hair pieces.

I also never understood why people grew their hair long on one side, then combed it over their bald spot. This looks more ridiculous than a hair piece. Not to mention that these people look even more idiotic when they find their ways to the beach and go for a swim.

I don't know too much about implants, weaves and the rest of the items for sale, other than they are too expensive for me. I once saw an infomercial for the GLH Hair Care Formula, which is basically a can of spray paint that you use to paint in your bald spot. The problem with that is that the formula is not water resistant, so these people look like a crying Tammy Faye Baker when it rains.

Magic Head doesn't have to worry about these things, though. I'll admit, when my roommates were around, I'd pretend to be nice to Magic Head. I'd talk to him, water him and move him into the sun. But whenever they went out, I'd be mean to him.

I'd lock Magic Head in a dark room, and I'd say mean things to him. Still, he kept growing to the point where his hair was three inches long, and thus, three times longer than my own. Having had enough of this humiliation, I cut all of Magic Head's hair off, leaving just a little flat top for him to enjoy.

But his hair grew back.

My hair doesn't grow back. I only get two or three hair cuts a year, and each time it takes longer and longer for it to get to the point where I say, "Gee, I need a haircut." Over the summer, someone told me that if I shaved my head my hair would grow in faster than normal. Being the gullible idiot that I am, I had my hair cut down to a fraction of an inch.

Four months later, it's now two fractions of an inch. That doesn't seem too fast to me.

The other day "somebody" accidently stepped on Magic Head. He was flattened on our front porch as he was basking in the sun. Both of his eyes popped off, and over the past few days he hasn't been responding well to attempts to save his miserable life.

But don't tell my roommates who did it. They might get mad and shave my head off.

Thankful thoughts on turkey day

One thing about being in college is that it seems to make us lose touch of the holiday spirit that we once so relished during the years of adolescence.

Gone are the days of cutting out paper turkeys and drawing pilgrims in art class. Nowhere do we see in our classrooms or lecture halls holiday decorations.

Gone are the days of psyching up for the big "Turkey Day game" against the rival high school.

David Chan

I can't even remember the last time I saw a Charlie Brown or Garfield Thanksgiving Special on T.V.

It just doesn't feel like Thanksgiving here at UMass. It didn't feel like it last year, either. All I know is that I could really use a break and there just happens to be one at the end of this month. I can't wait.

But this is the wrong attitude to take. Thanks to my elementary school teachers I understand that Thanksgiving should be a time of appreciation, or thankfulness. So here's a brief listing (in no particular order) of some of the things that I'm thankful for:

1) Whitmore — Yep, that's right. I work there. Stop sneering.

2) The Southwest residential area — I heard it's the third densest population area in the world behind New Delhi and Hong Kong. Instant bragging rights for Southwest residents (or former residents).

3) Extremely tight, uncomfortable lecture halls — otherwise I'd sleep through college.

4) GenEd requirements — Thanks to these requirements I have to take classes that I don't care about and that also take up my time.

5) The free snack pack that all on-campus residents received — This University is too much. Really.

6) The duck pond — This University could always use a few more quacks.

7) The stir fry place in the Hatch — I'd take this place over any on-campus McDonald's or Burger King.

8) The DC's annual Thanksgiving dinner — Mmm. Mmm. I can hardly contain myself.

9) My mother — Home cooked food and she reads all my columns.

10) My car — Otherwise, how can I get home?

11) My bunny — I wish I could keep her in my dorm, but I know she wouldn't be happy there. She's simply adorable. I got her last May.

12) Drew Bledsoe — The only time I got off my butt last Sunday was to jump for joy after Bledsoe's touchdown pass to Kevin Turner for the win last week.

13) Larry Bird — I'm sure many Celtics fans (as dwindling as they're becoming) really appreciate his greatness now. The Celtics are awful.

14) My good friend Emmanuel — He's always there and there's no one like him. Do you have a friend like that?

15) The aroma of manure that occasionally filters through Amherst — It really makes me miss my home in the city.

16) Christmas — Another break that's only five weeks away!

Pedophile hiring an "urban myth"

To the editor:

A front-page article in Wednesday's Collegian incorrectly left the impression that at one time the campus had a hiring policy that protected pedophiles.

Such has never been nor ever will be the case.

UMass does not condone pedophilia or any other illegal activity. The University has a standard affirmative action policy that states we shall not discriminate based on race, gender, national origin, veteran status, sexual orientation, etc.

What is true is that in the 1990-91 academic year, UMass trustees added the clause that the campus would not discriminate based on sexual orientation, "the exception being adults who have sex with minors." That exception was dropped after one year for the following reasons: it is not standard language for affirmative action policies and no other UMass campus included that clause; the clause left open the question of whether UMass condoned other criminal activity if such activity was not included in the policy; and positioning the clause immediately following the category of sexual orientation may have inaccurately implied that UMass was saying that most pedophiles are homosexual, which is not true.

Unfortunately, the pedophile hiring claim has become an "urban myth." It is not true.

Amherst's bars need revamping

Walk down Amherst's main strip on North Pleasant Street and you'll undoubtedly notice something similar about all the bars — the size.

Aside from Charlie's and The Pub, both of which are a bit offset from the craze of the main drag, the major bars in downtown are much too small and much too similar. I realize that space is limited on the coveted property in downtown, but something has to be done.

Rafters, arguably the best bar in Amherst, and definitely the best sports bar in the area, has the right idea. They have good food, reasonably priced beer, pool tables, lots of room, and free popcorn. They also have lots of televisions. The thing I like best about Rafters is the size. I can't remember the last time I felt squished there, whereas I have felt cramped in some of the small upsown bars even on cold Tuesday nights (Don't ask what I was doing out drinking on cold Tuesday nights).

Caleb Cochran

Now, I realize what the response to my complaint is going to be: "There's no room to build a bigger bar downtown!" Tragically, this actually may be the case. The buildings on North Pleasant Street are crammed together as it is, especially on the side of the street which now houses all the bars. However, what's to stop some of the owners from collaborating and making one big bar instead of having two identical establishments side by side? I know I'm simplifying things, but I think something can definitely be done.

If the bars cannot be expanded in size, they can certainly use some new ideas in terms of theme. Granted, the three main bars on North Pleasant are a little bit different, but they are basically all undersized, overcrowded, and without much ingenuity as far as marketing themselves. I realize that these places don't really need to make an effort to draw crowds — with the lack of bars in town, they're all going to be crowded — but it would be nice to actually have some variety among the bars.

What kind of variety am I looking for? It doesn't have to be anything extravagant, but it seems that all the bars have the same setup — a few TVs, a small bar, a few seats (emphasis on few), and an open area where everyone stands and spills beer on each other.

When I was in school down south last fall, all of the bars had a different feel to them. There was one cheesy dance club, one hardcore sports bar, one '70s bar, etc. When you got sick of one place, you'd stumble down the street to a new bar with new faces and a new theme. All of the bars did good business, but since there were so many of them, no single bar was always packed.

In Amherst, we don't have the luxury of choosing from ten or 15 bars within walking distance of each other. This being the case, I can't understand why the bars in town don't make more of an effort to distinguish themselves from each other. I would love to have a sports bar, a dance club and a regular ol' smoky poolroom bar all in a row. As it stands now, we have three virtually identical sardine boxes right in a row, with nothing to differentiate one from the other except the differences in the length of the lines coming out the door. And as long as we line up to drink in these shoeboxes, nothing is going to change.

Late autumn longings for snow

I've never seen so many shades of brown. All around, there is brown. The ground, which was once a lush green carpet is now covered with a thick brown coat of dead leaves. The trees only weeks ago were vibrant shades of red, yellow and orange, but now they are naked. Their bare brown trunks are some of the ugliest things in nature. This time of year drives me crazy.

Mark McGrath

November weather is awkward. Sweaters are good for October, when the weather is brisk. Coats are good for December, when the temperature is cold. November is stuck somewhere in the middle. A choice between a sweater and coat becomes a choice between a little chilly and hot and sweaty. There is no alternative, just uncomfortable.

This time of year fills my soul with melancholy. There is no escape from the doldrums. I can only sit and wait, wait for something better, something which will make my heart skip a beat. This something will bring me out of my depression. This something is snow.

I get excited just thinking about snow. I know it's going to come, but I don't know when. When it does arrive, the first thing I'm going to do is run around in it. The wait is agonizing. It's like a little child waiting for grandma to visit. She will be there, but no one knows for sure when. Until then, a pair of restless eyes will look keenly out the window, waiting for that old white car to come rolling down the street. The much-awaited arrival of grandma is rejoiced, and when she walks through the door she is greeted with a big hug and kiss. When the snow comes, I want to give it a big hug and kiss to welcome it.

Snow is one of the most wonderful things of nature. It is pure white and blankets the landscape. It transforms those ugly, naked, brown tree trunks into works of art. It makes the world a nice thing to look at. Beauty isn't the only great thing about snow. It's fun too. Just think of the wide variety of things you can do if there is snow on the ground.

I remember the wintery days of my childhood. We had the greatest snowball fights. We made snow forts, and lived in them for extended periods of time. We built them up and fortified them. We dug out tunnels and compartments for ammo. We spent hours on those forts, and for what purpose? So that the kids next door could storm them and destroy them and we could do the same to theirs. That was the essence of childhood, the essence of fun.

My red sled was the best. I could race it down the hill, and see how far it would go. When my ride was over, I'd run that sled right back up the hill and do the same thing all over again. If I felt like being risky, I might try surfing down the hill on a sled appealed to me. I knew it was nearly impossible to make it down all the way, but insisted on trying anyway. Many bumps and bruises resulted, but that wasn't important to me, the excitement was.

With the snowstorm came the proper attire. A snowsuit, although cumbersome, had an aura about it. When paired with some moon boots and a stocking cap, it made quite an outfit. Only my hands were left unprotected. It is in hindsight that I can truly appreciate the mittens my mother knitted for me and which usually ended up lost in a snow bank somewhere. They were piecemeal, made up of patches of extra yarn from around the house, but they were warm. There's nothing better for keeping a finger thawed than three companions wrapped in a warm package.

The end of the day and the early sunset brought us valiant snow warriors back to our homes, where we could drink hot chocolate and let our limbs thaw out.

The winter is a special time for me, a time of warm memories. The snow filled world seems to me a paradise now. It's something I long to reach. It is far away now, and I am destined to spend what seems like years in this purgatory called November.

I think nature made November such a rotten month so that when the winter comes, it is anticipated and appreciated. Thanks, November, for making the snowy winter so sweet.

James Taylor entertains crowd at Mullins

By Jacob W. Michaels

JAMES TAYLOR
Mullins Center
Nov. 16

"Wearing a grin from ear to ear, and suddenly it's perfectly clear — you're why I'm here." James Taylor's song rang true last night, as he played a three hour show at the Mullins Center.

A packed house cheered their approval from the start, when Taylor came out and shook hands with people from the audience. It was the start of an excellent show, as Taylor acted about half as old as he looks, throughout the evening.

It may have been one of the last shows of the tour, but he had as much energy as if it were his first show in five years. At times it seemed as if he were on the verge of forgetting to return to the microphone to sing because he was enjoying dancing around the stage so much.

Taylor opened with "Well On A Hill," and then, bathed in golden light, played his classic "Mexico." In the first set, Taylor also played such classics as "Handyman" and "Country Road." He joked with a fan who asked him to play "Steamroller," saying, "[It's] written down, but we gotta go through a lot of other crap first," as he pointed to the setlist.

When fans responded positively to Taylor taking off his vest, Taylor gave an amused look and thanked everyone for being so "generous."

Before the set ended with "Copperline," Taylor also played his "Shower the People," with some help from backup singer Dorian Holly.

A crowd awaited Taylor as he returned, and Taylor proceeded to shake hands with his waiting fans.

The crowd pulled their lighters out as Taylor started the set with "Carolina on my Mind." Taylor then played some work from other artists, such as Carole King's grammy- winning "You've Got A Friend," and Buddy Holly's "Everyday."

The crowd surged to their feet to dance as Taylor played "Steamroller," segueing into another classic, "How Sweet it is." Taylor ended the song with a jump into the air spinning around 540 degrees. The crowd roared as Taylor and the band took their bows and headed backstage.

The Mullins Center nearly shook as the fans cheered their approval. The roar didn't stop until Taylor returned. And he didn't come alone. James brought out his brother Livingston to sing a duet, "City Lights." Before they sang, Livingston mentioned how great it was to, not only be on the stage getting ready to sing with his brother James, but to be at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, where their niece goes to school.

After the duet James Taylor sang his trademark, "Fire and Rain," as lighters appeared in the Mullins Center like stars in the sky.

For the second, and final, intermission, Taylor played "Ties that bind us," and then finished with another trademark, "Sweet Baby James," wherein he sings that he has "one mile behind him, and ten thousand more to go."

Finally, with another round of hand shaking and goodbyes to all the fans and to his niece, Taylor forced himself off the stage, where a stagehand must have stopped him from coming back to play more. A

Trying to play and win the dating game without a whole deck

I was confronted this past weekend with a question that seems to always be on the minds of my parents whenever I go home for the weekend: Why don't I have a woman that I'm romantically involved with?

In a way I think we all dread the weekend trips home during the school year. Once in a while I just have to go home to recharge the batteries and watch Beavis and Butthead until I get a dull throbbing in my brain. But all too often these trips (which, by the way, I keep going on voluntarily) turn into excruciating examinations of my social activities, and usually leaves me scrambling for the door on Sunday morning.

My parents didn't confront me with this question right away, mind you, they waited until we were all at the dinner table. You see, my parents seem to have this theory that we shouldn't ruin dinner by discussing sensitive topics. Of course this theory only applies to their lives. If it involves me it's alright if they ask me anything from whether I wear boxers or briefs to why I constantly bite my nails.

So I was asked the dreaded question, and after replying that I was without a romantic interest in my life they wanted to know the next most embarrassing question on this topic: "Why?" And what was I supposed to tell them?

"Gee, Mom and Dad, I'm not quite sure why I don't have a girlfriend, I guess I have to admit that I'm a loser."

Mike's Mental Stew —by Mike MacLean

Somehow I feel that this is exactly what they're waiting for, so they can touch me with some words of wisdom like parents seem so eager to do, but I don't ever say that. I usually respond with, "I don't know." This is because I'm pretty sure they think I'm antisocial. However, even though this is not true, the reasons behind not having a significant other would only make them believe this even more.

The problem for me is the entire social atmosphere of dating altogether. I'm just not good at it. And while I'm sure you could just say that I'm whining because I can't get a date, this is not the case. In fact, it doesn't bother me to the extent that I'm losing sleep over it.

As I sat there trying not to pay attention, my parents went on to remind me that college was a great opportunity to meet women because of the sheer numbers of the opposite sex in attendance.

Wow! Thanks guys, not only do I now feel like there's something wrong because I can't get a date, but now that you've reminded me of how I can't get a date at a school with 10,000 females. . . Well, lets just say I feel much better now. By the way, Mom, is the oven still on?

The problem that leads my parents to feel that I'm antisocial, is that I just really shy. I have problems talking to people that I have just met — especially complete strangers. This means that walking up to someone, introducing myself and striking up a conversation with someone is out of the question.

And while I realize that they are just concerned and interested in my life, I don't think they realize that not being a party animal or overly outgoing diminishes the odds a lot, especially when you're at UMass.

"Hey baby, come to keggers often?" It's just not me.

I'm not 21, but even if I were I'm sure I'd find the bar scene just as frightening as the club scene. If I do venture out to clubs, I'm either in the front at the stage or in the back with the shadows, it's just the way I feel most comfortable.

I don't believe for a second, however, that I am antisocial. A vast number of my friends would tell you that often they can't shut me up. But it's just around strangers that I close my mouth and attentively observe everything. I make friends slowly, which can be an good thing or a bad thing, but that's just how I do it.

Funny thing though. When I was in high school my parents disapproved of my dating any one person and felt that I should hang out with friends more. And now that I'm here, I'm supposed to flip it around. That's parents for you.

Redefinition of beauty new photo book's goal

By Laura Schmidt
Collegian Correspondent

Debbie Notkin, author of Women En Large: Images of Fat Nudes, presented reasons why fat women are beautiful and real to a roomful of about 20 women at Lunaria bookstore on Wednesday.

"Beauty is not something we have to take away from one group in order to give it to another," said Notkin.

Notkin's presentation included readings of excerpts of her text, Women En Large, and a slide show of nude models whom appear in her book.

"The fat woman's body is one of the unstudied spaces. For years it has been taught that fat is the metaphor for too much," said Notkin.

Notkin has been touring with Lauric Edison, the photographer for Women En Large, during which they expose, explain and educate the public about their work.

These women, who self-published out of San Fransico after two trying years of searching for a publisher, are currently on a tour of the East Coast.

According to Notkin, by the end of this, their first tour, they will have visited 15 cities, with a stop in Hartford on Thursday.

"Our intended audience is first, fat women and, second, people who love fat women," said Notkin.

Many people who attend these presentations are people who know and who are very close to fat women, said Notkin.

Notkin used one example of a woman whose mother was large, and how Women En Large and its presentation was a terrific way to celebrate and acknowledge the larger community.

One main point that Notkin wished to stress was that being fat is not necessarily unhealthy. "Diets don't work. About 95-98 percent of them fail," said Notkin.

Notkin made reference to a women named Carol, who is an energetic dancer and a certified aerobics instructor.

"Carol is living proof that fat people are not necessarily lazy," said Notkin.

During childhood, at a very early age, we are bombarded by stereotypes that fat women are not only lazy, but ugly, said Notkin.

"Fat beauty has been disguised by patriarchy and culture," said Notkin.

"Our culture views beauty like a cup. It is only big enough to fit so many people, and these are people are usually thin women," said Notkin.

Beauty not only includes thin women, but also incorporates fat women. "Fat is on a continuum of beauty," said Notkin.

G. Love and Special Sauce add spice to rhythm and blues music at Pearl

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

G. LOVE & SPECIAL SAUCE
Pearl Street
Nov. 15

It was a night of 90s' souped-up blues seasoned with a Special Sauce at Pearl Street when G. Love mixed his hip-hop style lyries with a twist of soul on Nov. 15.

Playing a random assortment of old blues music with a new groove of soulful funk, G. Love and Special Sauce did not disappoint a sold-out show, but musically, came up a little short. Love and company did their best to live up to their blues-band billing, but it was evident from the start that the three-piece has yet to find an identity.

Special guest Jasper, who raps on the band's self-titled debut album, joined Love on stage for the encore; a slowed- down version of "This Ain't Living." The song combined all the elements of the band's musical influences ranging from the Beastie Boys to Aretha Franklin to Bob Dylan.

While playing both lead guitar and harmonica, Love was only able to create a solid concoction of hip-hop and blues sporadically during the performance. Jasper's vocals could not overshadow the inconsistency of Love's performance.

Love's obvious egotism throughout the show, while hard to swallow, grabbed the attention of the audience and created a party atmosphere.

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

G. Love

During a bluesy rendition of "Baby's Got Sauce," Love appeared to be seducing the crowd with closed eyes. While Jimmy Jass Prescott kept the rhythm on stand-up bass with the help of drummer Jeffrey Clemens (appropriately nicknamed the Houseman), Love went into a story about how he found his girlfriend in bed with another man.

Prescott was the highlight of the show, playing an old- style blues bass with the ferocity of a lead guitarist. His performance added a needed soul to the band, but was overshadowed by Love's stage show. Love may have been the crowd pleaser, but Prescott added the spice to the Sauce.

Prescott and Love created a "party feel" to the show while throwing back shots of liquor openly in between songs, and during two inappropriate drum solos by Clemens. The awkward breaks in the music, while giving Love and Prescott a chance to catch their "breaths," disrupted the flow of the music.

Love attempted to recapture the spirit of the blues music during "Fatman," "Walk to Slide" and "Garbage Man," but was unsuccessful. The two songs were unable to reach the intensity and musical mix that was found on the album.

The band finally reached a creative blend of music during crowd favorites "Shooting Hoops" and "Cold Beverage." Love was finally able to capture the proper combination of 90s' R&B with jazz, while adding the needed ingredient, lyrics which made you want to "penetrate like Mike" then grab "two six packs and a big bag of ice."

Although G. Love and Special Sauce may have not produced the desired intensity of their music which was so well expressed on their album, the band did open the doors for a new wave of music. Few left from the Pearl Street show unhappy, and at a mere 22-years-old, Love has plenty of time to find his proper groove. C+

Unhappy Webber traded to Bullets

By Rob Gloster
Associated Press

OAKLAND, Calif. — Chris Webber, whose differences with Golden State Coach Don Nelson escalated during a contract dispute, was traded to the Washington Bullets on Thursday, less than a day after re-signing with the Warriors.

In exchange for the power forward who was last season's NBA rookie of the year, the Warriors received small forward Tom Gugliotta and the Bullets' first-round draft picks in 1996, 1998 and 2000.

The move came after the Bullets earlier in the day had signed first-round draft pick Juwan Howard, who as a "Fab Five" teammate of Webber's led Michigan to the NCAA championship game in 1992 and 1993.

And it came some 20 hours after the Warriors re-signed Webber, who exercised his option to terminate a 15-year, $74 million contract in the offseason and became a restricted free agent in June.

The Warriors had to sign Webber to trade him.

Webber said he was unhappy playing for Nelson, and the hard feelings intensified during the contract stalemate when Nelson said he'd quit if that would help bring Webber back to the team. That remark angered Webber, who felt it was an attempt to turn public opinion against him.

"I don't know what I have done in the past that would make Chris so angry that he wouldn't want to play for me. I never thought it was as serious as it turned out to be," said a somber Nelson.

"I don't think I made any major mistakes in handling Chris, but I guess I did."

The 6-foot-10 forward averaged 17.5 points and 9.1 rebounds and shot 55 percent from the field last season. Despite Webber's absence this season, the Warriors won five of their first six games.

New Warriors owner Chris Cohan, who signed Webber to a one-year contract Wednesday night with the understanding he would be traded, said there were irreconcilable differences between Webber and Nelson.

"It was not a money issue. He wanted to be happy, and he wasn't going to be happy with the Warriors. It was mostly due to Don," said Cohan, who met alone with Webber 10 days ago.

"He did relate to me that last year really was one of the most miserable years of his life."

GW the favorite in tough Atlantic 10

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

This year, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team's number one goal is to win the Atlantic 10. The conference looks to be strong again this year after sending three teams to the NCAA Tournament last season.

"The A-10 will be very interesting," A-10 Commissioner Linda Bruno said. "All of the teams are playing better, and I expect them to get some national attention."

George Washington

– The Colonial Women, who have put together four consecutive 20 win seasons, advanced to the NCAA second round last year. They return all five of their starters from a team that had a 13–3 league record, tied with Rutgers for the best mark in the conference. GW has been picked as high as No. 13 nationally in some pre-season polls.

"They are the class of our league," Massachusetts Coach Joanie O'Brien said.

GW Coach Joe McKeown's squad will be led by seniors Darlene Saar and Debbie Hemery, both of whom were First team All A-10 last year, and 6–foot 2 sophomore Tajama Abraham. Abraham, the conference's Rookie of the Year last season, led the A-10 in blocked shots.

Rutgers

The Lady Knights, led by last season's A-10 Coach of the Year, Theresa Grentz, have to find someone to replace departed senior Caroline DeRoose, last year's A-10 Player of the Year.

"She was the heart and soul of that team, and those are big shoes to fill. But Theresa will get them ready," O'Brien said.

The leading candidate to step it up for Rutgers, who pulled off a big upset over top ranked Tennessee last year, will be junior Liz Hansen, a point guard who averaged 16.0 points per game last season and was named first team A-10.

"We have a lot of work to do, but we have a lot of depth and experience," Grentz said.

Massachusetts

With four returning starters, the Minutewomen look to be in a good position to better last year's 7–9 conference record.

"There's no more excuses for us," O'Brien said. "If we play well, we believe we can match up with anyone in the conference."

Forward Octavia Thomas was First team All A-10 last year and center Melisse Gurile was named to the league's second team.

Forward Crystal Carroll and guard Beth Kuzmeski, members of last year's A-10 All-Rookie team, also return to help the Minutewomen try to improve on last year's sixth place finish.

St. Joseph's

Coach Stephanie Gaitley's squad comes in after a stellar season last year in which the Hawks led the nation in defense, allowing only 53.9 ppg.

Their league record of 11–5 was good for third place, and with a mark of 19-9 overall, they also earned a bid to the big dance.

The Hawks graduated three starters however, including A–10 first teamer Robyne Bostick, and have some big questions that 6–foot 2–inch senior center Tonya Wenger may not be able to answer alone.

"Statistically, we could be in trouble. But I think the tradition and chemistry of our senior class will help us come together," Gaitley said.

Rhode Island

Despite the WRams' 8–8 league mark last year, they won 20 games and have four starters returning for this year's campaign. That includes senior Rebecca Bright, who should be in the spotlight for the Rams.

"Rhode Island always plays tough," O'Brien said. "You have to watch out for them."

Coach Linda Ziemke will also look to the experience of junior Marcie Byrd and super soph Dayna Smith, the A–10's assist leader last season, for some scoring punch.

West Virginia

The Mountaineers return one of the most dangerous players in the league, Lisa Szymczak. The junior led the A-10 in rebounds per game and is the conference's top returning scorer as well.

Still, WVU Coach Scott Harrelson's squad was a disappointing 4–12 in A–10 play last season, and his young team still has a way to go.

"We're still a year away from being a quality national caliber team," Harrelson said. "But we will surprise some people."

St. Bonaventure

The Bonnies finished tied with URI for fourth in the conference last season and lost two starters to graduation.

St. Bonaventure Coach Marti Whitmore, a former St. Bonnie's player, took over last year and will continue to look to bomber Suzie Dailer for offense. The junior led the league with 77 treys last season, and returns as the Mustard and Brown's leading scorer.

Duquesne

The Lady Dukes and Coach Dan Durkin are hoping to improve on last year's seventh place finish and will have to count on senior Chris Chandler to do it.

The 6–foot 2 Chandler, who is the top scorer and rebounder returning for the Lady Dukes, has her work cut out for her if she is going to lead Duquesne out of the depths of the A–10's bottom half.

Temple

And that leaves Coach Charlene Curtis' Temple Owls. Temple had a dismal 2–14 league record last season and said goodbye to three starters to boot.

The Owls have six juniors coming back, including point guard Renee Jones. But not one returner averaged over 5.5 points per game last year.

"We're not surprised to be ninth," said Curtis. "But I guarantee we will not be ninth at the end of the season."

Management and players meet to discuss new "tax" plan

By Chris Sheridan
Associated Press

HERNDON, Va. — Striking baseball players received a 102-page contract proposal from owners Thursday that calls for a "tax" on revenues and payrolls. It was management's first new offer since June 14.

In a windowless conference room at a hotel near Dulles airport, the two sides met together for four hours. Players left the meeting carrying blue folders containing copies of the proposal.

Neither side would reveal details of the offer, and the players said they wanted to read all 102 pages before commenting.

"They did not go over it page-by-page. They summarized it," union executive Mark Belanger said.

Added Kansas City pitcher David Cone: "We've got to read it, talk to our economists about it and see what its impact would be. There are some guys who probably won't get much sleep tonight." No one from management made himself available for comment. "I will not characterize the discussions today, other than to say we're here discussing the issues," said mediator W.J. Usery, appointed by President Clinton. "We'd all like an agreement and both sides are working hard to get one."

The players were pessimistic before the session, and Cone said bargaining was intense Thursday.

"It was heated at times, and maybe it needed to be," he said. "There was a great deal of rehashing of our differences. Maybe Mr. Usery is right that we need to get our grievances out in the open."

Belanger described the mood as "good at times, sometimes not so good."

Each side had between 12 and 15 people at the meeting. Several tables were assembled in a rectangle, with players sitting on one side, management on the other and Usery and two assistants in the middle. The meeting room was on the ground floor of the Hyatt Dulles hotel, about 25 miles outside Washington.

Owners are trying to bargain for an economic system that will help struggling small-market teams compete on a somewhat equal financial basis. Owners have shelved their earlier proposal, which guaranteed players half of all revenues in exchange for a cap on team salaries.

This is the second round of joint talks since September. The sides met for three days late last week in Rye Brook, N.Y. Union chief Donald Fehr left at 5 p.m., saying he had a prior commitment. The rest of the bargaining teams stayed behind closed doors for another 30 minutes.

Before the talks began, players and union officials were wary. "I'm not going to be optimistic," Belanger said. "We've been down this road before, and I don't anticipate anything much different than what we've seen in the past."

"I have no feelings. This is John Harrington's show," Fehr said, referring to the owners' new lead negotiator.

The new offer is the owners' first since two months before the start of the strike that forced the cancellation of the World Series for the first time since 1904.

Players made a "tax" proposal in early September, calling for a levy of about 1.6 percent on the 16 highest revenue producing and payroll-heavy teams. owners ejected it.

"We'll see if they've taken our basic principles and worked with them, or if they're offering something basically the same as the salary cap," Milwaukee pitcher Bob Scanlan said. "If that's the case, we won't accept it."

are terrible. Our guys need to realize that the other teams will pressure them while killing penalties. We have to adjust to that," Mallen said.

BU comes in having split a series with Northeastern, dropping its first game of the season last Friday night. The Terriers have been led by forward Michael Grier, who leads the team in scoring with 10 points (6 goals, 4 assists). All six of Grier's goals have come on the power play.

The Terriers biggest question mark is in goal. All–American J.P. McKersie was involved in a car accident over the summer and Herlofsky has been locked on to pick up the slack. In six games, Herlofsky has compiled a 3.63 GAA and a .833 save percentage.

"We are going to need to play hard. We've had nervous energy for our two home games. We need to just go out and play," Mallen said.

Mallen will make a game-day decision on the starting goaltender. The line–up figures to have few changes, with one change possibly being the use of a defenseman (Mike Gaffney or Keith O'Connell) at a forward spot.

"It's a matter of deciding whose hot in goal. It's a tough situation having three goaltenders. All three (Regan, Dave Kilduff and Rich Moriarty) of them have played and will continue to play," Mallen said.

Hockey East Note: The conference has voted to clarify the awarding of points in league standings. A win is worth five points, a tie is worth two points, and winning the shootout garners one bonus point.

The game can be heard on WMUA, 91.1 FM, pre-game starts at 6:45 p.m.

for this game. Both [Tyrone and Inus] showed signs today."

Last night was an important tune–up, since the Minutemen's next game is a week from today as they take on defending national champion and No. 1 Arkansas next Friday in the Tip Off Classic in Springfield.

What was Faruk Rasna and Alper Yimaz last night will be Corliss Williamson and Scotty Thurman come Nov. 25.

highly successful (235.3 yards per game) rushing offense.

"These two have anchored our line. Joe is really terrific and Todd has waited a long time for a chance to start and made the most of it," Hodges said.

Matt Stefanski and Matt Read: when UMass goes to the air, these two are usually involved. Stefanski has showed his blocking and receiving skills at the tight end position. He's made 16 catches for 174 yards. Read has caught nine passes for 82 yards.

"Stefanski has been a force, making some great catches as a big target down field. Read doesn't have the great stats, but he has always been there when we go to him," Hodges said.

Roger Kotlarz and Phil Curtin: UMass suffered big losses at the linebacker position due to graduation. Kotlarz has stepped in at outside linebacker, recording 84 tackles. Curtin has split time at middle linebacker, seeing more action as the season went along.

"We lost a lot there, but we made up for it. We've gotten some good play from our linebackers," Hodges said.

UMass will attempt to send these seniors out with a win against a UConn team which has a tough season under first– year coach Skip Holtz (son of Notre Dame coach Lou Holtz).

The Huskies are 0–4 on the road this season. They are led by senior Ed Long, UConn's all–time leading rusher with 2,466 yards. UMass' defense is the top ranked unit in the Yankee Conference, allowing only 275.5 yards per game.

Injury report: starting middle linebacker Mike Valentino has been lost indefinitely. He severely injured his knee in last Saturday's game. He will have surgery soon and is expected to be out of spring practice, hoping to return in the fall.

were named to the Conference's First Team.

Nash, a first–team selection last year as a freshman, averaged 2.93 kills, 2.51 digs and .59 blocks per game this year, establishing herself as a leader for the Minutewomen. Her crowd–pleasing jump serve helped her to 39 service aces.

Rivera, who is in her first season with the Minutewomen, led the team with 429 kills. Her 4.42 kills per game were second in the conference. She was also second on the squad with a .263 hitting percentage and 3.05 digs per game.

Other top performers for the Minutewomen include freshman Lesley Nolan, who leads UMass in service aces with 41 and in digs per game with 3.43. The outside hitter is also second with 3.20 kills per game.

Another pair of freshmen, both middle blockers, have made their mark at Massachusetts. Leigh Readey leads the team in hitting percentage with .263 and Michelle Paciorek is first on the team with .90 blocks per game in her first season.

The lone senior on the team, setter Cass Anderson, is getting set for her final volleyball matches as a Minutewoman. Anderson, who will suit up for the women's basketball team at the end of the volleyball season, is second in the Atlantic 10 in average assists.

George Washington's Liu Li was named the conference's Most Valuable Player after leading the league in hitting efficiency, and Colonial chief Susie Homan was chosen as the league's Coach of the Year.

Rhode Island setter Jessica Salman captured the A–10 Rookie of the Year Award after finishing third in the league in assists.

What is usually an earmark of a "great" player is the performance in the big games. Relating to Mujica, the junior goalie has been on a role in this key part of the season. From the second round match with Harvard (11 saves) at the EWPA playoffs late in October, to the Eastern Championship game against Navy (17 saves), he has averaged 10.8 saves and 8 goals per game. Meanwhile, the team has averaged 15 goals per game. This appears to be a good sign as the Minutemen prepare for the NCAAs in Long Beach, CA, and to Mujica himself.

"We don't want to go out there and get humiliated. The West Coast teams think the East Coast doesn't have good water polo teams or programs," Mujica said. "Last year, we went there to prove to ourselves we could do it. Now we got to prove to them that we can go out there and win a first round game, and get into the Final Four."

Relive these great Collegian filler oldies:

The Mushy Marlion Space Patriot did not take kindly to young folks... That's why it was no surprise when little Max, Brad, and tiny tot Andrew were thrown in the Intergalactic Slime Pen. "Why is it always the good ones that suffer?" whined Andy. "Shaddup!" replied Maximillian and Brad. Andy ignored the older boys, as he scavenged another twist-tie. He had plans. BIG plans. He didn't plan on getting snared.
Collegian
"Just another brother on intergalactic lockdown."
my eyes teared as I hacked my desert dry cough at the road dust that swirled up from behind the passing semi. Yes, I was lost... a long way from the rotting New York cul-de-sac I had called my home. I was sure I had packed the chloroform in my fat Albert lunch box. Bernie was supposed to bring the cookies and the wacky tobacky, but had lost his connection while playing Connect Four with some G-men. Then I opened my lunch box... Why HAD I eaten that moldy bread? Why DID I let that circus bear break my heart?
Mass. Daily Collegian
Wherever you go.
SWELL!
I checked into the Rustic Nail Motel and asked the owner if he knew of any swinging sushi bar deli joints where I could hook up with a fix of Tuna Maki and Knockwurst on Rye. "The eternal question," he said, "is how to get the maute out of the bottle." I thanked the wise old man and checked into room six sixty six. I opened up my suit case cum brown paper bag, and pulled out the Collegian. "We put the mauve in the bottle."
"I overcame my fear of French Poodles and Nail Diamond in only 21 days!!! "And it's all because of you Mass Daily Collegian"

Join us, as we race through the universe... In our last episode Tiny Tot Andy had overpowered Ketahi, the overlord of the slime people, with his daguerreotype and his wacky tobacky, but had lost his twist ties and bottlecaps.) Today: "Controlling the evil dictator's mind with the device, Andy frees himself and the other boys, Brad and Brad, and apologizes Andy, "To the spaceport!" With Ketahi under his control, Andy quickly winks through the heavily guarded battle compound. The boys enter the 1-5 Imperial Space Shuttle and blast off to their freedom.
What an escape!" exclaimed Max as he hit the jettison button, thrusting the gasping Ketahi into the great vacuum of space. "What revenge!" yelled Brad, for he was proud of Andy. "Aww... It was nothing!" blushed the red the Collegian wouldn't handle!!!"

Camby, Padilla lead UM in romp

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

An intrasquad scrimmage would have been more of a challenge for the No. 3 University of Massachusetts men's basketball team than the Turkish Junior National Team posed to it last night.

Regardless, it was a different look for the Minutemen, and one that resulted in an 86–57 victory at the William D. Mullins Center in their final exhibition game of the season. That makes two exhibition wins for Massachusetts in as many games, as it defeated Marathon Basketball last week, 93–84.

Massachusetts 86
Turkey Junior 57

Massachusetts Coach John Calipari said he was concentrating on his own team's play rather than the strengths [if there were any] of the Turks.

"I wasn't worried about them, I was worried about us. And what I saw tonight is that we have improved. You got to understand, what I saw last week [against Marathon], we thought we were going to outshoot them, and we didn't.

"Today, we started to. We rebounded offensively, I thought we swarmed at times defensively. It was good — there were some good signs," Calipari said.

One good sign was center Marcus Camby, who scored 26 points, including 23 in the first half. Camby was the focus on the offensive side, with senior co-captain Lou Roe sitting out of the game due to a pulled hamstring that occured over a week ago in practice.

Granted the competition was sluggish and not up to the caliber Camby is used to playing against, but he did take advantage of the weaker post-players, especially at the free-throw line.

"[Marcus] did some good things, there were times in the second half where he wasn't as aggressive," Calipari said. "Believe me the way people are going to try to play him is to physically bang him.

"What was good was you look at his [free-throw shooting], going 10–14. That's a great line. If he can understand he can get to the line and make shots, just get to the line, don't worry about scoring. He did some good things."

Edgar Padilla, who received the starting nod at shooting guard, was impressive, scoring 12 points, dishing out four assists and chalking up four steals.

"I was happy with Edgar, I thought Edgar did some good things again," Calipari said. "The kid is steady, that's what's great about him."

Camby and Padilla were the only Minutemen to score in the first 12-plus minutes of the game, until Tyrone Weeks hit a free throw with 7:27 left that made it 26–14.

Forward Dana Dingle [nine points, seven boards] drained a three-pointer with 5:38 remaining in the first, capping off a 23–0 run on the Turks, giving Massachusetts the lead 36–14. The Minutemen went into halftime with a 25-point lead, 48–23.

The second half was not as much of a shellacking as the first, as Massachusetts outscored the Turks, 38–34 [led by forward Donta Bright's eight points and six rebounds]. That, though, included the 10 garbage points in the last two minutes of the game for the Turks, led by Burak Sezgin's five points.

PAUL BLODEAU \ COLLEGIAN

Freshman guard Andre Burks scored four points and dished out two assists in 14 minutes of action in Massachusetts' 86-57 win over the Turkish Junior National Team last night.

Every able Minuteman saw some playing time [Roe was out with the injury, and guard Mike Williams sat out the second of his three-game suspension]. That included Weeks' five points and five rebounds in 14 minutes of play.

Freshman Inus Norville, who sat out the Marathon game due to a paperwork error with the Student Athlete Clearing House, made his collegiate debut last night; he played 16 minutes [four points, 2 rebounds].

"I needed to get Inus in there, he had the jitters," Calipari said. "It's his first opportunity. He didn't get that opportunity to play. That hurt him and set him back

Football hopes to send seniors out with a win

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

This Saturday at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium will be the end of era for the University of Massachusetts football team, saying goodbye to its seniors in the season finale.

A disappointing season will come to a close for UMass [5–5, 4–4 in the Yankee Conference] as well as for Connecticut [3–7, 3–4].

"A win on Saturday would give us that winning season that every program strives for," UMass Coach Mike Hodges said. "We didn't want to be in this position, but now our goal is to send the seniors out with a win."

That group of seniors is part of what Hodges refers to as a family, not just a football team. Saturday will be the last hurrah for some key members that have been the foundation for UMass football.

This group of seniors has won 24 games since its freshman season in 1991. They are part of the senior class that was the first ever to defeat Delaware in Amherst, and helped UMass tie the record for regular season wins with eight last season.

Brian Corcoran, Ben Albert and Silas Burke: the threesome have combined to form a top defensive line. Corcoran is tied for the team lead in tackles with 84, leading the squad with 13 sacks. Albert has eight sacks, while Burke is third on the team with 73 tackles.

"Unquestionably the strength of our team, this may be the finest defensive line we've ever had," Hodges said.

Tony Williams: the cornerback has performed well this season, doubling as UMass' kickoff return specialist. Williams leads the Minutemen with five interceptions, also averaging 21.6 yards per return attempt.

"The guy has had a great senior season. He's bounced around a lot here, was a quarterback once, but he's stepped his game up this year," Hodges said.

Joe Sabella and Todd Tinker: the two have been the mainstays of the UMass offensive line this season. Sabella, a three-year starter at right tackle has been the veteran leader of the unit. Tinker has been a key to the

Goalie Alex Mujica is a stalwart on defense

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

A week from this Friday, the No. 10 nationally ranked University of Massachusetts men's water polo team [30–6] will be competing in the NCAAs for the second year in a row.

The success for the team this year can easily be seen in the offensive output it has created in its domination over its East Coast opponents.

But what holds the key for the Minutemen this season is not the amount of goals they score, but the amount they do not let in.

Defense is what sets up the offense, and is always the main factor in winning games, no matter what competitive team sport you are talking about.

Between the posts, and the stalwart on defense for UMass the last two seasons, has been one of the best water polo goalies in the nation, junior Alex Mujica [170 saves in 74 quarters played, for a .556 shooting percentage and a 7.35 goals against average].

> "Alex as an athlete doesn't look like a great one, but he is. He has tremendous hand–eye coordination, really fast hands, and can get out of the water as well as anyone."
> –Russ Yarworth

With physical stats of 5–foot–7 and 160 pounds, you would not think they away that this player could have a significant impact. But in the eyes of UMass Coach Russ Yarworth, that does not mean nothing, because of the intelligence and natural ability Mujica possesses.

"Alex as an athlete doesn't look like a great one, but he is. He has tremendous hand–eye coordination, really fast hands, and can get out of the water as well as anyone," Yarworth said.

"You might have some 6–foot–5 goalies around, but Alex has a great knowledge of the game. He is always in good position which gives him a better opportunity to block the shot.

"Alex is the backbone of our team. He does his job. He blocks the ball, and if our team defense does the right things and he knows where the shot is coming from, he is not going to make too many mistakes.

"No goalie is going to make the great save all the time, but he does."

From his early childhood, his size and weight were a problem from the beginnings of his water polo career.

But he kept with it and learned the basics of 8–meter and field play. He was switched to goalie by his coach.

By 16 years old, the gold, two silver and bronze medals he won with the Puerto Rican junior national team, emphasized that he had finished the transitional circle.

Water polo is a physical sport, but emphasis also lies in the psychological aspect of the game.

The players on the team have always been the catalyst to this mental part of his game, and is "the greatest part of the sport," according to Mujica.

Giving him motivation and communicating the things he does wrong and right, his teammates have helped in key additions to his complete game.

"My aggressiveness is the best part of my game. When I am talking to the guys, giving directions of where they should go and whom they should guard, that is what a goalie needs to do. I think I am pretty good at it," Mujica said. "I learned most, since I started playing water polo, to have patience and trust for your teammates.

"If you trust your players, and they back you up, you're all set. You don't need anything else."

The consistency of both team chemistry and gametime play were the chief concepts Mujica brought up in the team's continued success from last season and their second Eastern Championship crown.

"For me, starting from preseason, three weeks before classes started, I've been here practicing hard with a lot of dedication to it," Mujica said. "For the team, we have pulled it together from a slow, sluggish start. We have gone up and now I think we are at the

Minutemen hoping for big upset against BU Terriers

By Anthony Guido

A first-year Hockey East team will have many obstacles to overcome along the way, none bigger than Boston University.

The University of Massachusetts faces BU in a home-and-home series this weekend, looking to establish itself in college hockey's top conference. The Minutemen [0–6–1, 0–3 in HE] host the Terriers [3–1–2, 2–1–2] tonight at 7 p.m. in the William D. Mullins Center.

"This is one of those games that will show us where we are," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "This is a well-coached, well-trained, very talented team."

This match-up shapes up on paper as a mismatch. In the pre-season Hockey East coaches poll, BU was picked first, while UMass was predicted to finish last.

The Terriers began the season as the No. 1 team in the nation.

"This game will give us a good indication as to how far along we are. I've stressed that to the team," Mallen said.

BU returns a highly skilled unit, having reached the championship game of the NCAA tournament. The Terriers feature four of the seven members from the pre-season all-conference team.

"There have been a lot of upsets in college hockey this year. There isn't a game on our schedule this year that we don't have a chance to win," Mallen said.

Goaltender Derek Herlofsky and forward Jacques Joubert have struggled a bit this year. Defensemen Rich Brennan and Kaj Linna round out the group.

"We will do nothing different against them. They have star defensemen, but it's still our 20 against their 20," Mallen said.

The Minutemen return home after two contests last weekend against Air Force. UMass dropped the first game 5–2, but was able to rally to tie the second game on Saturday to stop the season opening six-game losing streak.

Freshman goaltender Brian Regan was in net for the tie against Air Force, making 36 saves. Regan is sixth among goaltenders in Hockey East with a 4.00 goals against average, with a 3.89 in overall games.

"To pull the upset, we are going to need real good goaltending. We have got that so far," Mallen said.

Offensively, the Minutemen have been balanced, led by Rob Bonneau and Blair Wagar. Bonneau leads the squad with four goals while Wagar is tops in assists with three. Each has a short-handed goal, combining with Warren Norris to give UMass three short-handed tallies. The power-play (3 for 48) continues to struggle as Mallen searches for the right combination.

It will be one and done from here on out for the University of Massachusetts volleyball team.

The Minutewomen, with a record of 25–4 overall, 10–4 in the Atlantic 10, head to the A–10 Tournament this weekend at Duquesne University in Pittsburgh, Pa., with the league's No. 3 seed.

"We've had a great season," Massachusetts Coach Bonnie Kenny said. "I expect them to play well in the tournament."

UMass, currently ranked No. 15 in the Mideast Region, will face the sixth seeded West Virginia Mountaineers in first round action this afternoon at 4 p.m. UMass has defeated the Mountaineers twice already this season, 3–1, in Morgantown, WVa., and 3–0 at the Cage.

The winner of this matchup will face the No. 2 Rhode Island WRams, who earned a bye in the first round on Saturday.

The other first round contest pits No. 4 Temple against No. 5 Duquesne. That match begins at 7 p.m. tonight, with the winner to face top seeded George Washington Saturday evening.

"We're as ready as we are going to be," Kenny said. "Physically, we're not getting any better. But if we can fine tune a few things, we'll be in good shape."

Last year, UMass entered the tournament with the number six seed, and knocked off No. 3 Rhode Island, 3–15, 15–10, 15–7, 12–15, 15–8. The Minutewomen then fell in a heartbreaker to Temple, 15–13, 11–15, 11–15, 15–12, 10–15 in the semi–finals.

The 1994 season has been an extremely successful one already for UMass volleyball. The team set a school record for home wins with 14, shattering the old mark of 10, and also broke the team's record for A–10 wins.

With a 10–4 conference mark, UMass doubled their previous high total of league victories [5] which was achieved by last year's club.

Teachers worried about future

■ Department heads meet to voice concerns about funds

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

The faculty at the University of Massachusetts is concerned with the possibility of reductions and reallocations in funding to academic units in the next five years.

Approximately 40 department heads met on Friday morning to discuss the recently proposed future budgetary changes at the UMass made by Chancellor David K. Scott at a meeting on October 21.

Scott's announced his plans for the next five years, which have appeared to call for reductions in funding to academic units, resulting in a reduction of about 13 percent from current base budgets, according to a draft of a memorandum.

The draft of the memo from the Departmental Chairs' Transmittal Committee to Scott, was passed by a vote at the Friday meeting. The meeting established the three-person committee to represent the faculty in the attempts for discussion with Scott.

The memo is asking Scott to "establish a long-run means through which there could be a continuing dialogue between the departmental chairs and the administration regarding needs and strategies for reallocations."

"Our intention was to have a transmittal committee take this issue to the Chancellor and try to develop a dialogue," Resource Economics Department Chair Barry Field said.

Department of Entomology Professor Ring T. Carde said he feels dialogue between Scott and the faculty must be reestablished with a definite focus.

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN FILE
Chancellor David Scott

"My perception is that dialogue has broken down," Carde said. "We need to focus this thing like a laser beam, rather than blurring the boundaries."

The meeting created a brief forum for the faculty to voice their feelings about the proposed cutbacks, and establish a means for discussion with Scott.

"We need to address the erosion of academic funds," Carde said. "We have to be careful to realize that the administration will reallocate funds."

Money which would normally be used for academic needs would apparently be reallocated to non-academic functions of the University, which might result in the elimination of faculty positions, according to the memo.

Department heads expressed the concerns of the faculty regarding the possibility that the cutbacks could result in the loss of over 100 jobs.

"We are gravely concerned about the potential impact of this on the ability of the faculty to offer high-quality education services to the University of Massachusetts," according to the memo.

"The implications of the cutbacks, as you [Scott] have made clear, is a reduction of about 115 faculty positions over the next five years."

According to the memo, the cutbacks will be in addition to the 9 percent decrease in faculty positions that have occurred during the last five years.

"It would mean a further reduction in the University's investment in academic programs, a reduction that has been taking place at an alarming rate in recent years," according to the memo.

The Departmental Chairs see the cutbacks as a continuing part of the crisis in higher education.

"The 'crisis' in higher education, if indeed it may be called that, stems from the growing perception on the part of parents and the public that universities and colleges have been allowed to erode their abilities to offer straightforward, high quality education experiences to students," according to the memo.

"Reallocations away from academic units would simply make the 'crisis' worse here at the University of Massachusetts," according to the memo.

Local teacher honored with award from Disney

AMHERST — The Disney Teacher's Award, broadcast live on the Disney Channel last week, put the spotlight on an Amherst elementary school.

Barbara Skolnick Rothenberg, a second grade teacher at the Fort River Elementary School, was named outstanding in early childhood education in Disney's national teacher's award.

"I represent a lot of early childhood teachers across the country," Rothenberg said. "It was a celebration of the entire teaching profession."

> "I represent a lot of early childhood teachers across the country," Rothenberg said. "It was a celebration of the entire teaching profession."

Rothenberg said she was nominated by her colleagues, but there was a long process in coming to the decision.

According to Rothenberg, last year parents and colleagues sent letters to the Disney Company. This was followed by three days of taping in the classroom by Disney to make a profile of Rothenberg.

"These short profiles were shown to a committee representing national organizations," Rothenberg said. "They made a selection of people for oral presentations in Washington [D.C.]."

The oral presentations, which took place last Monday, was the last step in the selection process. The teachers chosen, spoke at the same podium where Martin Luther King Jr. made his "I Have A Dream" speech.

"It was so inspiring and moving to be at the same podium," Rothenberg said.

The award ceremony was last Thursday where Rothenberg received her award on stage from actor Tony Danza.

Other stars on hand were model Cindy Crawford, actor Alan Alda, and actress Mary Matlin.

"[Teachers] were given red carpet treatment — we were treated like kings and queens," Rothenberg said. "We met with Vice-President [Al] Gore. The Walt Disney Company provided a wonderful weekend for teachers."

Rothenberg's full time assistant, school of education elementary program major, Betsy Kennedy, took over Rothenberg's class in her week long absence.

"She is such a great role model," Kennedy said. "I have learned so much from her this semester."

Kennedy said Rothenberg deserved the award because she is a step above many teachers.

"She teaches students in a real life way, she doesn't try to isolate them from things," Kennedy said. "She talks about prejudice, even at this low grade level."

Rothenberg also juggles working with the school of education at the University of Massachusetts, by supplying her classroom as an outlet for interns.

"She doesn't simply do her job, she goes beyond," Kennedy said. "She takes on interns — she really helps me to become a better teacher."

The Fort River School greeted Rothenberg with a banner, and a welcome back breakfast, said Rothenberg.

According to Kennedy, Rothenberg attributed the award to everyone she works with, saying it is her peers she learns from.

"I feel very fortunate to be with such a wonderful group of colleagues," Rothenberg said. "Who also represents excellence in education."

UM Engineers hold program for Girl Scouts

■ Workshop seeks to encourage young women to enter sciences

By Jessica Taverna

JESSICA TAVERNA / COLLEGIAN
Eighth-grade Girl Scouts from Great Barrington assemble a bridge with civil engineering students Saturday in Marcus Hall.

Statistics say that women are less likely to get into careers involving math and science.

Members of the University of Massachusetts Women in Engineering and the Society of Women Engineers organizations disagree.

On Saturday they held a program for young girls to expose them to different scientific principles and make the fields seem less intimidating.

The event entitled "Careers in the Year 2,000 and Beyond" drew approximately 60 Girl Scouts from all over the area to take part in games, experiments and tours of the campus, according to Joanne Chappius, a senior chemical engineering major and member of the Society of Women Engineers.

"We want to start getting them to ask questions on how things work, why things work and just get their curiosity going," Chappius said.

The program involved a series of experiments drawn from the fields of mechanical, chemical, electrical and civil engineering, all conducted at the Gunness Student Center in Marcus Hall.

"We wanted to see the girls have a special opportunity to work with women engineering students, and saw it as a great opportunity to use a super resource in the community," said Diane Houston, the director of membership marketing for the Western Massachusetts Girl Scout Coucil. "We've gotten a tremendous response."

The civil engineering table seemed to be the most popular of the four that were conducting experiments. Girl Scouts had the chance to build bridges out of popsicle sticks that were weight-tested at the end of the day to check for proficiency.

"We need women in the engineering program to introduce girls at a young age to these careers, because the school systems don't do that consistently," said Bottone Hellman, undergraduate dean of the college of engineering.

The college of engineering was approached by the Girl Scouts to do this as an outreach activity, and there were a lot of women in engineering who had been Girl Scouts and were eager to do it, Hellman said.

"I think a lot of people wish they'd had this when they were young," Chappius said.

This year's event was so successful that they are going to try to do it annually, Chappius said.

Most of the girls expressed a profound interest in science and no fear of its complexity, in contradiction to statistics.

Jessica Woodruff, a seventh grader from Great Barrington said she "likes science and it's pretty easy."

Author looks at prison system; Ward Churchill gives untold story

By Hernan Rozemberg

"I welcome you to the most incarcerated country in the face of the world," said Ward Churchill, achieved and respected Native American author and activist.

Churchill spoke on November 19 on political prisoners and the criminal justice system, and the status of imprisoned people in the United States today. He was the keynote speaker of Prisoner Awareness Week, which concluded with this last lecture.

Among other books, Churchill has written Agents of Repression and The Cointelpro Papers, two well-noted publications on the government's reactions to put down political dissenters who fail to abide by the status quo.

From the very beginning of his lecture, Churchill made sure to remind everyone of the symbolism and irony of the location of the meeting --the town of Amherst, named after Lord Jeffrey Amherst, "a known murderer who committed genocide against over 100,000 American Indians," he said.

Next, the lecturer plunged into the depths of the complex and overlooked reality behind the current dilemma surrounding the American judicial system. According to Churchill, the United States is second only to Austria in incarceration rates. 267 per 100,000 Americans are in jail.

African-Americans are by far the largest incarcerated group, since today one in four Blacks under the age of 25 sits behind bars; moreover, says Churchill, it is the goal of the U.S. Government to make this ratio one in two.

Prof: AIDS, economics are interrelated

By Colleen D. Shanahan
Collegian Staff

Michelle Murrain, associate professor of neurobiology at Hampshire College spoke Wednesday about "The Political Economy of AIDS: Women, Race, and Class."

The lecture was given at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center as part of the Brown Bag program for Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Affairs.

"There is a laser beam focus on AIDS which blinds us to other risk factors besides behavior," Murrain said. She also said that a potential factor could be economic status.

In a 1993 AIDS study Murrain conducted, the focus was on how economic status poses a change in risk of infection. The study found a possible correlation among people below the poverty level with an increase in infection.

The study concluded that a homeless person is 78 percent more likely to become HIV infected than someone with adequate housing. Afro-Americans and Latinos are three times more at risk than Whites, and people who are receiving public assistance or are on Medicaid become infected three times more than those who can afford third party insurance.

"There is a definite feeling for how income, per se, is related to HIV risk," Murrain said. She maintains the higher income one has, the more access there is to education, better nutrition, and suitable housing.

Murrain said women in particular are victims to the economy.

One problem the majority of women face is being economically dependent on men. Murrain feels too many women fear they will lose their partner and economic stability if they demand the use of condoms.

Another problem for women is finding a good ongoing health care provider. Many women do not feel they are receiving sufficient care, nor can they afford the treatment they do get. Some women try to get into clinical trials which are testing new drugs because they receive the medication free of charge.

Murrain believes the political economy is a global issue, especially in terms of treatment. The majority of HIV victims have little or no access to health care or facilities.

The simple act of getting a HIV blood test costs around twenty dollars.

"No big deal, unless you are dealing with a third world country whose people can usually afford twenty-five cents a year for health care," Murrain said. "The AIDS treatment drug AZT costs thousands of dollars a year."

Stocks Fall Again As Inflation Fears Continue

NEW YORK (AP) — Stocks retreated for the third time this week, as investors fretted about higher interest rates and bonds failed to recover.

Investors worried that rising rates could cut into corporate profits, and lure investors away from stocks and into higher-yielding fixed-income investments. They are unconvinced that the Federal Reserve's aggressive 0.75-percentage-point interest rate increase last Tuesday will be enough to head off inflation. Some believe rates could go even higher, despite some news earlier this week - including moderate consumer-price increases and a drop in housing starts - that inflation currently is not a problem.

"The mood is clearly very somber," said Hugh Johnson, chief strategist at First Albany Corp. "The bond market has not responded to what would ordinarily be good news for the bond market. The Fed raised rates more than expected, and yet the bond market continues to decline."

Dollar Makes Gains Despite Deficit Rumors

NEW YORK (AP) — The dollar rose against other key currencies Friday, largely undisturbed by a report that the U.S. trade deficit widened in September.

The deficit grew to $10.13 billion and was on track for the second-worst year ever, the Commerce Department said. The trade gaps with Japan and China were the most severe, at $5.37 billion and $3.49 billion in goods, respectively.

Traders said the Commerce report was generally ignored because it was in line with expectations and because market participants are more focused on inflation. There were no other economic reports to trade on Friday and activity was subdued, traders said. In the past, poor trade reports have hurt the dollar as traders theorized that the Clinton administration would allow the U.S. currency to fall to help narrow the shortfall.

The dollar seesawed throughout the day against the German mark and the Japanese yen mostly due to computer-generated trading, said traders.

Crops Make Gains Expectations High

CHICAGO (AP) —Wheat futures prices rose modestly Friday on the Chicago Board of Trade amid expectations for increased export sales. Corn and oat futures declined slightly; soybeans ended mixed.

Wheat traders were awaiting an Agriculture Department announcement targeting Egypt for new sales of U.S. wheat at subsidized prices. The announcement came shortly after the close, granting Egypt's request for an allocation of 1.3 million metric tons, as expected.

The gain in wheat futures extended Thursday's slight upturn. Wheat futures had fallen sharply early this week.

Wheat for December delivery rose 2 1/4 cents to $3.77 1/2 a bushel; December corn slipped 1/2 cent to $2.17 1/4 a bushel; December oats fell 1/2 cent to $1.22 1/2 a bushel; November soybeans dropped 1 3/4 cents to $5.61 1/4 a bushel.

Most cattle futures rose ahead of a monthly USDA report on cattle on feed in the seven largest cattle-feeding states. The report, released shortly after the close, showed 6 percent fewer cattle on feedlots Nov. 1 than on the same date a year ago. The number was at the low end of expectations.

Militants threaten Israel

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip (AP) — Trying to ease tensions, PLO leader Yasser Arafat released 31 Islamic militants from jail Sunday, and Muslim fundamentalist political leaders vowed to redirect their anger at Israeli soldiers and settlers.

But one armed group of Muslim radicals threatened civil war unless the Palestine Liberation Organization chief expelled top Palestinian police officials and punished others.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin responded to the threats by sending extra troops to the Gaza Strip to protect Jewish settlements and to the West Bank to prevent riots.

There were angry statements by leaders of both the PLO and the Islamic fundamentalist groups of Hamas and Islamic Jihad. The two sides blame each other for Friday's bloodshed, when Palestinian police opened fire on rioting worshipers, killing 13 people and wounding more than 150.

Only isolated outbreaks of violence occurred Sunday as a shaky truce held on the ground.

But Hamas' military wing, Izzedine al-Qassam, said it would attack officials of Arafat's government and start a civil war unless its conditions were met.

Results of new AIDS drug promising

LONDON (AP) — A combination of a new AIDS drug, 3TC, and AZT helps fight the virus better than AZT alone, according to two studies presented at an AIDS meeting Sunday in Glasgow.

The studies, involving 352 patients, traced blood chemicals in volunteers. Investigators did not compare symptoms or death rates, which provide more definitive proof.

"These results that we have today show that people (taking 3TC with AZT) should be living longer," said Dr. Francesco Bellini, president and CEO of Biochem Pharma, the Montreal-based biotech company that designed the drug.

AZT, also known Zidovudine, is the standard drug used to attempt to control AIDS.

Bellini added there is no evidence, yet, that 3TC prolongs life. "The results are fairly impressive. It's clearly a step forward," said Dr. Robert Schooley, head of the immunology committee of the AIDS Clinical Trials Group at the National Institutes of Health. He attended the AIDS meeting in Scotland. Speaking in a telephone interview, Schooley said "3TC by itself is not much of a winner because resistance develops quickly, but the virus has a tough time maintaining resistance to both (3TC and AZT)."

Noises heard on USAir Flight before crash

CHICAGO (AP) — At least three passengers on an earlier leg of USAir Flight 427 complained of strange noises before the jet took off on its final, fatal flight, according to a lawyer representing victims' families.

Philip H. Corboy, a lawyer suing USAir on behalf of some of the families, said reports of complaints were filed Thursday in depositions in federal court.

The three passengers said they had heard an odd noise during the Sept. 8 flight from Charlotte, N.C., to Chicago, he said.

The jet left Chicago for Pittsburgh later that day and crashed a few miles from the Pittsburgh airport, killing all 132 people aboard. Investigators have not determined what caused the crash. The type of noise the passengers said they heard was not detailed in the depositions, Corboy said, nor was it clear why they thought it was unusual.

Government soldiers attacked in Northwest Bosnia

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina (AP) — Renegade Muslim forces and Serbs were attacking government soldiers Sunday in northwest Bosnia, apparently trying to recapture lost territory before the United Nations could react.

Senior U.N. officials met in Zagreb, Croatia, to consider using NATO warplanes to attack Serb forces under expanded powers granted Saturday by the U.N. Security Council.

Government troops in Bihac, in Bosnia's northwestern corner, were under attack by rebel Muslim forces and Serb armor, according to the United Nations and both sides in the fighting. Serb artillery in neighboring Croatia was firing across the border at the government forces.

Serbs captured the waterworks for Bihac, a city of 48,000 people, giving them control of the water supply, said U.N. sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The assaults reflected the determination of the Serbs and of Muslims loyal to warlord Fikret Abdic to cripple the government army, which defeated Abdic in August and broke through Serb lines in a stunning advance last month.

Late Sunday, the Bosnian Serb military command claimed it recaptured all of the territory it lost in the recent government offensive, the Belgrade-based Tanjug News Agency reported. There was no confirmation from the United Nations, but the announcement appeared to be an indication the Serbs would stop their offensive around Bihac in hopes of averting a NATO attack.

A U.N. official in Zagreb earlier reported heavy fighting around Velika Kladusa, Abdic's former headquarters near Bihac. Government forces there are surrounded and the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the Abdic forces appeared to have the upper hand.

Another correlation Murrain's study found is between ethnicity and survival. Afro-Americans and Latinos, ethnic groups who have traditionally been in lower income brackets, have a shorter survival rate.

"This is a terrible proxy for economic status. It is indicative of the problem," Murrain said. "Seventy-five percent of women with AIDS are women of color with few economic resources."

Ultimately, Murrain would like to change the mindset surrounding AIDS. According to Murrain, people are stuck on believing, "you get exposed, you get infected, you get sick, you die." The truth of the matter is, some people are exposed but do not get infected and Murrain said we need to look at why.

"What is important to understand is that AIDS is beginning to change its face. We are never going to understand AIDS until we understand other factors, such as economic impact," Murrain said.

democracy and freedom everywhere, yet suppressing the voices of many who claim those same sentiments domestically, was also brought up by Churchill.

"What kind of freedom is it to be locked away in a steel cage with a bolted door?" he said.

The present crisis with prisoners in America should not be at all surprising, Churchill said, since it had all been part of a trend toward political repression that began three decades ago.

"The proliferation of police power and technology of today is all part of the pre-planning process of the late 1960s and early '70s," he said.

The very reason of incrementing incarceration rates was the cause of the increase in police personnel and equipment; the latter actually experienced "a 100 percent expansion in the period of 1971-1981 ... and a [further] 70 percent expansion in the 1980s," according to Churchill. Thus, he said, the reasons for the rise of police violence and brutality, which in turn has given rise to more and more crimes. Churchill detailed one aspect of this through an examination of the various Counter Intelligence Programs (COINTELPRO) against "subversive" elements on the part of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

These programs included the use of the judicial system, leaving targeted organizations financially obliterated by holding costly and enduring lawsuits, disinformation campaigns, organization infiltrators, and promoting internal divisions and confrontations within the group.

Contemporary high-security prisons exemplify the highest levels of political repression the country has reached, Churchill said. These centers are "designed as an experiment in order to prove valid that it is possible to reduce prisoners to psychological jelly," he said.

Prisoners are also being submitted to work for the government under different programs, with the objective of exploiting cheap labor for economic profit; inmates work for under-minimum wage while the products are sold at market value, according to Churchill.

"The prison system in effect is and has been a mode of legalized slavery," he said. Overall, Churchill concluded, the social-political-economic human exploitation underlying imprisonment still needs further exposure and examination.

Campus stabbing leads to arrest

A juvenile was arrested in the University of Massachusetts Student Union for an alleged stabbing with a knife late Thursday evening. The arrestee is not a UMass student.

The alleged assailant was charged with one count of assault with intent to murder and one count of assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, according to UMass police.

At 12:10 a.m. a verbal conflict between two juveniles led to the alleged attack outside of the Student Union Ballroom. The alleged stabbing followed a dance, police said.

The victim was brought to Cooley-Dickinson Hospital in Northampton and the alleged assailant was apprehended on the scene.

The case is still under investigation.

Film depicts tale of three female prisoners

By Sonia Paz
Collegian Staff

When the word "political prisoner" comes up in a conversation, many images of come to mind. Things like Amnesty International, torture, human rights violations and violence are talked about, but only when thinking of other countries.

According to Pat Luc Levasseur and the Alliance for Student Power and Solidarity, there are political prisoners in the United States. As part of Prisoner Awareness Week, here at the University of Massachusetts, Levasseur, a former political prisoner, led a discussion and viewing of the film "Through the Wire," a film about three women political prisoners who were placed in the Isolation Unit in the Female High Security Prison of Lexington, Kentucky, a prison within a prison.

The women, Alejandrina Torres, Susan Rosenberg, and Silvia Baraldini, all claim that they have been imprisoned unjustly based on their political affiliations. Torres was part of the movement to liberate Puerto Rico from the United States. Rosenberg and Baraldini, while one was charged with possession of fire arms and explosives and the other with robbery and accessory to crimes, were also imprisoned because of their ties with the Black Panther Party.

The women claim that they have been placed in isolation as an experiment, the outcome being to destroy political prisoners. "It's like a living tomb," said Baraldini said.

The cells the women lived in were painted white and were lit 24 hours a day. They were not allowed any visitors aside from their lawyers. They were constantly being videotaped, even while they showered.

Torres, Rosenberg and Baraldini also endured sleep depravation, once an hour while they slept they were woken up by guards, when this procedure was questioned by their lawyers, they were then woken up every half an hour. In addition to this their lawyers were also photographed and fingerprinted when visiting their clients.

The isolation these women endure has also affected their health. Upon being examined by a doctor, the women were found to be going through a pattern of deterioration. After being examined 180 days later, an accelerated rate of deterioration was noted, as well as depression and a loss of hope. They have also said to have experienced hallucinations.

Silvia Baraldini asked to go to a hospital after finding a lump in her pelvic area, she was ignored. With the help of her lawyer and numerous requests for medical attention, she was finally taken to a doctor, she was diagnosed with cancer. Baraldini has formally charged the Lexington Kentucky prison with willful neglect.

According to Levasseur, political imprisonment is not a new occupance in the United States.

"It is happening now and has been for a long time," she said. "Many people have files, such as SAGE and the Gay Mens Health Crisis Center".

Amnesty International has found the Isolation Unit at the Female High Security Prison in Lexington, Kentucky to be in violation of human rights. This leaves the incarceration of these women in question.

Torres was incarcerated for believing Puerto Rico should be liberated from the United States. Silvia Baraldini was accused of robbery and accessory to crimes, she was convicted even though she had an alibi, her passport shows she was in traveling in Africa. Rosenberg received a 58 year sentence after she was found with fire arms and explosives during a police raid. Yet, a grand wizard of the KKK was also found with an entire arsenal in his possession. He only received three years.

"I may not agree with my daughter's political views, but the punishment never fit the crime," Rosenberg's father said.

Gore's old letter to father blasts army

NEW YORK (AP) — Vice President Al Gore, as a college student writing home to his father, once cited the U.S. Army as an example of "fascist, totalitarian regimes." He now dismisses that notion as "a college kid's silly language."

The previously unpublished letters were detailed in the Nov. 28 edition of The New Yorker magazine, which obtained the missives from Gore's parents. After writing the letters, Gore served in the Vietnam War, an experience he now says "allowed me to shed that nonsense" about the Army.

"We do have inveterate antipathy for communism - or paranoia as I like to put it," young Gore wrote from Harvard to his father, then-Sen. Albert Gore Sr. "My own belief is that this form of psychological ailment - in this case a national madness - leads the victim to actually create the thing which is feared the most.

"It strikes me that this is precisely what the U.S. has been doing," the younger Gore continued. "Creating - and if not creating, energetically supporting - fascist, totalitarian regimes in the name of fighting totalitarianism. Greece, South Vietnam, a good deal of Latin America. For me, the best example of all is the U.S. Army."

The magazine noted that Cambridge, Mass., was a hotbed of political revolt at the time, and that Gore later enlisted in the Army and served in Vietnam.

"Obviously, that's a college kid's silly language in the midst of a very intense period for the country," the vice president told the magazine. "I went into the Army right after that. And I found out better. Being in the Army was one of the most important growth experiences I ever had. And it certainly allowed me to shed that nonsense."

Of America's "national madness" regarding communism, Gore told the magazine: "That's dead wrong, too. I have very strong, invetcrate antipathy myself for communism."

"I went through changes in my view of the Vietnam conflict when I went to it," he added.

When first asked about the letters - written in the late 1960s when he was a student at Harvard University - the vice president said, "Oh, good lord! Oh, God! Is that a private letter?" Also in the article, Gore dismisses suggestions that his political future is in danger because President Clinton's stock has fallen.

pound trail blazer putted the first of his three goals at 14:38, assisted on the power play by Chris O'Sullivan and Steve Thornton.

"We watch highlight clips just of [Grier]," Parker said. "He's a terrific two-way player."

UMass caught BU napping moments later, as other teams have done repeatedly to the Minutemen. At 14:53, Dennis Wright pulled UMass back within one, courtesy of a clever Toni Sheehan feed. Sheehan, UMass' most surprising offensive threat thus far, sent a faceoff to Wright, who lifted an 18-foot wrister past Noble.

Brennan, with 22 career goals to his credit, got his first as a senior at 8:07 of the second period on a power play, assisted by Bill Pierce and Bob LaChance.

O'Sullivan's goal at 17:53 on a two-man advantage made it 5-2, and Grier picked up one of his seven points on the weekend (five goals, two assists) with an assist.

Grier hit double digits in goals for the season at 3:13 of the final frame, again with UMass penalized, with assists going to O'Sullivan and Thornton.

Dean Campanale scored goal as a Minuteman cut the margin to 6-3 at 4:15, as Jaynen Rissling earned a team best third assist (Blair Wagar also has three assists).

Little used BC transfer Keith O'Connell opened his goal account with no help at all at 13:16, but BU erased all hope of a UMass comeback when Grier completed his hat trick at 17:57.

Kilduff was simply the story of Friday's first period, in which he stopped 26 of 29 shots. Thornton connected on a power play at 14:52, and Grier sped along the left boards then finished a shorthanded breakaway at 17:59.

As the horn sounded to end the opening stanza, UMass yielded an inexcusable third strike from Jon Coleman that Prendergast and Joubert assisted. UMass had control of the puck in the final seconds but chose not to clear it.

UMass quelled the incessant BU pressure in the middle frame, allowing only eleven shots. The Terriers did not increase their lead until 16:47, when Prendergast tucked home a sweet one-time pass from Joubert. Coleman also assisted the goal, Prendergast's third of the season.

Doug Wood, Grier, and LaChance added third period goals. Five BU skaters, UMass' Cahill and Tiger Holland and Parker are all Catholic Memorial graduates.

Sophomore center Mike Evans and the Minutemen turned in one of their finest performances of the season Saturday night, but fell to Boston University 7-4 in the second game of the weekend.

BU, the third ranked team in the nation going into the weekend, is the model program for UMass to pattern itself after. The Terriers, who made the NCAA championship game last season, always sell out Walter Brown Arena. BU fans are hockey fans, and the crowd makes it an intimidating place to play.

UMass fans displayed that same spirit on Friday night. The Mullins Center has the largest seating capacity in the conference and therefore the chance to be the most difficult place for an opponent to play.

"That crowd tonight was very impressive, they drew very well. They were noisy, intimidating and will make this place a very tough building to come and play in," BU Coach Jack Parker said.

The Minutemen now have some time off, a chance to regroup for a team admittedly frustrated a this point.

"It will be a time to take a step back. The team needs this time away from playing games, it should help us in the long run," Mallen said.

The Minutemen return to the ice on December 2, hosting Merrimack College. The Warriors were picked eight in the pre-season HE poll, right ahead of the Minutemen.

After the impressive showing from the UMass fans, another raucous crowd will begin to give UMass a reputation. A strong hockey tradition will take time, but the whole process is sped up if fans engulf the sport at the Mullins Center.

"The support of our fans is something that will be extremely important to UMass. Our program took a big step tonight, and so did our fans," Mallen said.

Youngstown St. next came to Amherst and walked away with a 28-9 victory. The Penguins represent the model program for Division I-AA football. This week, the upset loss to re-building UConn.

Looking ahead: Next year's schedule has been released and may be more favorable for UMass. Neither Delaware nor James Madison (Mid-Atlantic division champs) appear on the schedule.

The non-conference foes (Lehigh and Buffalo) aren't nearly as imposing as Youngstown St. was. UMass hosts Richmond and UNH, with road contests at bottom-of-the- pack Northeastern and Rhode Island.

Trying to hang on to your drink

Nathan Crick

"Oh, excuse me!" said the girl, her unfocused eyes looking helplessly at Eustacia Fields' beer stained shirt. "I'm so sorry....I...." she stuttered.

Eustacia absently brushed her shirt, and smiled weakly. "No problem, don't worry about it."

The girl stood there looking baffled for a moment, apologized again, and disappeared onto the Brandywine balcony where the keg was. Behind the screen door she began laughing with a couple other shadows.

"Well," Eustacia sighed to herself. "Well well." She stood leaning against the wall next to the couch, as people milled about her talking to one another.

Kent O'Brien maneuvered his way from the kitchen, in front of the television which was playing a Beastie Boy's video, and around the reclining chair, until he took a position against the wall next to Eustacia, although there was only enough room for his shoulder.

"Kickass party, eh?" he smiled, swirling his cup of Icehouse.

"Remind me again why we are here," she said, glancing down and brushing her shirt for effect.

"We are here," said Kent, "because it is Kelly's birthday party, and because otherwise we would probably be sitting at Mike's with a bunch of stoned people watching the Sci-Fi channel."

"Oh yeah, right," she nodded. "And remind me again why we always have to do that."

"We have to do that," he said. "Because if we didn't we'd both be sitting at home staring at the wall."

"Walls aren't so bad. Walls don't spill beer on you."

"They don't distract you either, though."

Eustacia laughed. "Oh yeah, we must be distracted all the time, mustn't we? Hell, if we didn't we might actually be productive or something."

Kent took a drink. "And who would want that."

"Right."

Watcha, watcha, watcha want?

The smiling form of Kent appeared suddenly from the bathroom corridor, and erupted into a state of Happy at the sight of Kent and Eustacia.

"Hey you guys," she beamed, giving Kent a hug, who tried to maneuver his beer to prevent spilling. A big clump of foam landed on Kelly's leg. "I'm sooo glad you could come. Cause ya know," she said, releasing Kent and bending covertly towards both of them. "I don't seem to know a lot of these people, they just came in. I think Marie kind of knows them. I hate when she does that."

"Hmmmm, yeah," said Eustacia, shaking her head. "That Marie..."

"I know it, it's like, it's my birthday," she said, tilting her head and waving her hand. "It should be my friends."

"Hmmmm," said both of them, nodding.

"Ya know?"

"Hmmmm."

A smiley guy bumped into Kelly from behind, making her turn around quickly. "Jeffy! How are you?" she said in recognition, and hugged him. They both drifted to a far wall and began talking.

"She's a bit tipsy," said Eustacia.

"But she found Jeffy," smiled Kent.

Eustacia raised her hands. "Oh, happy day!"

The Beastie Boys ended, and Beavis and Butthead came on. Exclamations of excitement and disgust emerged from the viewers on the couch. A big group of people came in the apartment, none of whom they recognized.

"This is lame," sighed Kent, leaning back on the wall. "Let's get outta here," said Eustacia.

"Okay."

Kent drained his cup and Eustacia put hers on the nearest end table. On the way out Kent caught Kelly's eye and she waved exuberantly before they disappeared out the door.

The sky was clear, with only the crystal outlines of small clouds passing by the moon. From different points came the concentrated sounds of music and vocal clatter.

"I tell ya, Kent," Eustacia said. "I just can't do this stuff anymore."

Kent kicked an empty beer can. "Yeah, I know. Getting wasted amidst a bunch of strangers just doesn't seem to have the appeal of before," he paused. "God knows why."

"Man, every weekend I sit around and want to do something else, go somewhere or see a play or something," she said. "All I do is sit around with the same old people, talking about the same old thing."

Kent looked at the ground. "Hmmm."

"I don't even care anymore."

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"I mean, anything. Hell, I don't even care about my friends anymore sometimes. All I want to do is go drive out to Arizona. But what's out there? I don't know."

"I just want to graduate and get out," said Kent. "That's all I'm counting on right now. That and going on vacation to Louisiana to see a friend of mine."

"Yeah," she sighed, absently brushing her shirt again. "We're all so screwed up, Kent. Everyone I know is screwed up. Feels like everything is slipping away."

They walked by the pond, still forms of ducks floating quietly, the seated forms of two people on the other side holding hands, the strobe light from a nearby apartment reflecting off the water.

Eustacia paused, looking at the lighted balcony. "The worst thing is though, that I just don't give a damn."

"I know, Eustacia," said Kent, standing with his hands in his pockets. "But at least that still bothers you. Some people just let it go. Let themselves die."

Eustacia kicked a rock. "Yeah," she sighed. "I can wait."

Sweet dreams of Time and Forever

Paul Sarkis

The abyss of silence and darkness in which I lay sleeping was abruptly shattered by a brilliant flash followed by a violent crash, which I feared woke the dead. What ensued was a comedy of errors as I struggled to plug-in my reserve lamp. The complications were as follows: I could not fit the two tiny prongs on the plug into their allotted slots.

The hang-up was that one prong extended in width towards the end while the other one's sides remained parallel. One slot was obviously larger than the other to accommodate the aberration. However, the complete darkness, coupled with my incoherence, having been pulled from my slumber like an infant from the womb, made it nearly impossible to complete this task.

After much toiling and cursing, I was finally able to line up the plug with the outlet, as the Earth to the Sun, and my universe was illuminated. Having successfully completed this mission I was forced to bide my eyes until my iris' were able to shrink to the exact size to prevent damage to my retina. Finally, I was able to focus in on my clock, and I immediately realized, through precise calculations in my mind, that my hour-long catnap had turned into two hours and seventeen minutes of deep REM sleep.

Suddenly, a distant, yet familiar image broke through the barbed wire fence which protects my conscious world from my subconscious one.

It was familiar because I had witnessed it only moments before. It was distant because I witnessed it in what is known as a dream, and although it was fading quickly, it was still a very unsettling thought.

I was standing, in this image, on the fringes of a clearing of a great forest of history. My figure rested just outside the revealing sunlight which exposed the clearing and everything in it. There appeared in the light a figure who was Life and who carried a straight wooden staff.

Then, rising from the shadows, like the Phoenix from the flame, appeared Death who brandished a great hammer of war. They met at a place called Forever and drew lots for my soul. I did not see Time, however, for he was hidden behind a rock. The two figures at Forever laid down their implements on a man-made formation of granite. Life's staff was straight and narrow, while Death's hammer extended in width towards the end. The situation seemed so curious to me that I decided to venture out into the clearing to find out what, exactly, I could find out.

As I neared the meeting-place my steps were halted by a force which seemed to come from within. There were no barriers, nor any other interference, however my body abandoned all movement and my mind could not argue. I was informed that neither of the figures before me held the advantage and that my soul was now lost. I turned to leave the forest, pausing only to call out to Time, exclaiming that I had no use for him anymore.

I scampered through the forest finding no trails, and no light, only endless trees, some which stood straight from the roots as they pointed towards the heavens, while others extended in width as they towards the end. Finally, after what seemed to be hours of wandering through a brown and green eternity, I found a shoreline. Before me spread a large green bay being encircled by specs of earth and trails. In the horizon I soon viewed two objects.

As they drew closer, I recognized them to be ships. One coming from what I presumed to be the East, which resembled a Viking warship, the other from the West (perhaps) flew the flag of piracy. Soon both sets of oars were hoisted, and the sails were flown. The Viking ship carried one square sail which was straight on all sides, while the pirates sails extended in width towards the end.

A fierce battle was apparently to follow, and as I watched anticipating the carnage the abyss of silence and darkness in which I lay sleeping was abruptly shattered.

Weary of destructive hatred on T.V.

Emily Marino

They say that everyone should have at least one hour a day to devote completely themselves. I like to take my hour at the end of my campus day, before I rush off to some evening meeting or embark on a night of academic stimulation.

Though this sixty minute period is partially consumed by my attempt to prepare something for dinner (and I use the word prepare loosely), when I get the chance I like to turn on the TV and let the late afternoon talk shows shed light on the various struggles of the American people. Their hopes, their fears, their dreams, their dysfunctional relationships — it's all there, thanks to Ricki, Oprah, Phil, Montel, Maury, Geraldo, and the other one-name wonders of the screen.

Though Oprah was a high school favorite, Ricki has taken priority as of late. Ricki received thumbs up from the beginning because of her energy, her personality, and the way she related to her guests as though they were friends.

The show topics attempt to represent common issues of the average, everyday person. Ricki plasters topics on the screen after every commercial break, in big, bright letters. "You're using me, now you're gonna lose me," "I'm in love with my best friend," and "I'm having your baby and you don't know" are some that come to mind.

I used to think that watching these shows would give me insight on normal social problems, help me realize that we all have not-so-nice aspects of our lives, and provide me (and the guests) with sound advice.

When, after years of studying these shows I realized that my plight to understand was useless, I liked to yell at the TV screen. This was my therapy, after it became clear to me that talk shows are more like three-ring circuses than keys to sharing human communication and understanding.

Now I cannot even find the heart to yell at the screen. Stories about lovers cheating on each other, friends who betray one another, dysfunctional families featuring everything from incest to multiple marriages, the rejection of relatives because of their sexual orientation, interracial dating: the list goes on.

Fourteen-year-olds are having sex with numerous partners without protection from disease or unwanted pregnancy. Women scream at each other about stealing boyfriends while these guys sit and enjoy the cat fight. Young adults recall childhoods of sexual abuse and explain that they have trouble moving on in their everyday lives. Others struggle with alcohol and drugs.

Ignorance, hurt, greed and disregard for human life are at the bottom of almost all of these stories, and airing this dirty laundry does not help us to understand each other; it makes us sadly realize how we have come to treat ourselves and others. The people on the screen are the people of our neighborhoods, and the families we see are illustrations of what the family unit has become in modern-day America.

We have become careless with one another. We have forgotten to respect each other and learned instead to see the other as competition, as the enemy. We have neglected to learn how to develop honest relationships and look to criticize and even sabotage others to make up for our failures to relate to one another.

We have ignored our education and forgotten to take care of ourselves. We have taken advantage of one another, used each other for selfish reasons and in some cases destroyed the hope of others to ever have healthy relationships. We have learned to give up too easily: to turn to easy outs that often result in hurting ourselves or someone who cares about us. We have stopped listening to each other.

Ideally, the talk show gives us an opportunity to listen while providing the guests a forum to openly share their issues. Time and time again, though, these people are mocked and their ignorance is exploited by hosts who sensationalize (even Ricki is guilty of this) to the delight of the shouting audience (we home viewers included), day after day.

Though I know I will continue to watch Ricki every chance I get, I cannot deny the twisted nature of being entertained by the anger, pain, thoughtlessness and malice of other people.

As long as these talk shows air, I will probably be guilty of spending my one "me" hour watching them, admittedly with some degree of hypocrisy in continuing to be drawn in despite my frustration. My dinner has to be made somehow, and at the very least, the catastrophe on the screen helps me to avoid thinking about the one in the kitchen.

Letters to the Editor

Women spared the nightmare of war

To the editor:

This is in response to the letter written by Erin Barnes concerning women in combat. In the letter written by Ms. Barnes she stated that there is a level of sexual discrimination concerning women in combat. Well, she's right. I was a United States Marine and while in the Marines I witnessed what could be viewed as sexual discrimination on several occasions.

However, she also said the armed forces has yet to meet real life. So let's get real. The job of the military as a whole is to win wars. The way you win wars is to destroy more of the enemy's personnel that they destroy of yours. For this reason there are small specialized units who operate almost exclusively in enemy territory doing various "things."

The members of these units are highly trained and very good at what they do. The members of these units are so good at what they do, they can actually smell the enemy before they see them. Right now you're probably saying "yeah right" between your laughter but it's true. And the fact is, that women emit a stronger and more distinct scent than men. This could easily spell death for a team operating covertly in enemy territory.

I have no problem with women in the military, nor do I have a problem with women assuming certain combat roles. To me it has nothing to do with your sex or sexual orientation for that matter. It has to do with life and death.

One last thing. Ms. Barnes expressed hope that women would serve next to men on the battle-field. Be careful of what you hope for, Ms. Barnes. I've been in combat, I've taken human life and I've seen human life taken away from my friends. Most of all I know what it's like to spring up in bed covered in sweat and screaming their names as their deaths occur over and over again in my nightmares.

Fashion article misses categories

To the editor:

I am writing this in response to the article entitled, "Whatever You're Wearing...You're Wrong," in November 10 issue of the Collegian. I actually enjoyed the article very much, but at first I was offended. My friends and I all live in Southwest and although not all of us fall into the group that you labeled as the "Southwest look," we do agree that the people around here do dress like that. Maybe not all of them, but a vast majority really do.

I felt offended being labeled, but as I went to scratch the back of my head, I felt the pony tail jetting out from the back of my Cocks hat, so I realized that I had no right to be spiteful. Then, however, I realized that the author, Ms. Connelly, only pinned one type of dress on one certain living area.

What I mean is that she should have assigned the people from the "I am a stark individualist" look to the Sylvan area, the "I wanna live in the '60's and '70's" look to the Central area, and so on. If she is going to label people in one living area, then at least do every one of them, don't just single out one.

Another comment that I have about her article is that Ms. Connelly forgot two more major groups. The first one is the "Help me I am stuck in the 80's and I can't get out" look. These people can be seen moon walking around campus to Bon Jovi's "Slippery When Wet" In their Walkmen, while sporting a pair of pettle-me-pink stirrup pants tucked neatly inside their pastel green socks and white Princess Reebocks.

A final group this group will probably have her hair feathered on the sides and her bangs curled back on top of her head. Inside her Trapper Keeper with the kitten on the cover, will probably be a note to her friend opening with "Sup? Your pants I hope!" and closing with "C U Soon!" or "Luv Ya!"

The other group of people I feel that you forgot to mention is the "I bet you can't tell what sex I am" look. My friend and I play the "guess the gender" game often because these days, you just can't tell. Their clothes are unisex, their hair is unisex and even their voices are unisex. This problem is getting so bad that soon, people are going to have to start wearing tags with "male" or "female" on them. After all, being a heterosexual, I would prefer not to hit on another female.

Finally, I have one last question for Tara that I am dying to know the answer to. What group does she fall into? She seems to be making fun of all the different types of dress on this campus so I wonder which one she is. Or maybe she doesn't fall into any of the groups that she mentioned, but one of the ones that I added. I only hope that I don't break her Cindy Lauper tape when I walk by her. And I pray to God that I don't hit on her.

One word encompasses the Kyuss experience-weight. This is the album Soundgarden should have made after Badmotorfinger; instead they opted for the quick commercial buck. Kyuss mix the tones of Metallica with intense, jam- honed psychadelia. They replace the men-in-black's tightness, with a tie-dyed pliability. The songs on Sky Valley are arranged in a triptych, with three songs filling each track. This of course reeks of pretentious Yes-isms, but Kyuss have the style to pull it off.

This is thrash with an I.Q. Kyuss understand that this genre is all about a killer riff that goes for the jugular and a bassline that is a catalyst for bowel movement. These elements come together best on "Gardenia" and "100."

The most interesting of these three suites is the second; beginning with the molten-slab that is "100," "Space Cadet," which out comatoses Smashing Pumpkin's mellower tracks and "Demon Cleaner" whose groove-mungus riff is the perfect vehicle for John Garcia's echoes of Robert Plant.

Song titles like "Supa Scoopa and Mighty Scoop" and "Conan Troutman," tell you that the brooding, desert sky of the cover should not be taken too seriously. This album is not experimental over several tracks, but within an individual track. Songs rumble along, speed up, trip out to kiss the sky and sink like heat into desert sand.

It is space age in a Hawkwind sense, but also rooted in the Californian desert where the band love to jam and hang out/

Kyuss hold a paradoxical balance: they are brain-seizurely heavy, yet suspended in a flotation tank.

"Main tool mounted, hungry and mean, fast and clean," sings Wool vocalist Peter Stahl, and rightfully so. The band's full length debut, Box Set, powers through 11 songs of sonic barrages, jazz-tinged sonburness, and country stylings.

This awkward amalgamation of genres isn't too left of center as it merely offsets the album from their punk rock sound.

Wool are not just jumping on the punk bandwagon though. Brothers Peter and Franz Stahl (along with Dave Grohl of Nirvana) paid their musical dues throughout the 80's playing in the Washington D.C. punk band Scream.

Wool is more accessible than Scream, but only because of the increased level of musicianship. Bassist Al Bloch and drummer Chris Bratton prove to be a cohesive rhythm section playing with each varying mood, while leaving space for Franz Stahl's textural guitar leads, slide solos, and walls of feedback. Peter Stahl's vocal also shine from his dissonant wails ("Coalinga," "Kill The Crow") to melodic croons ("Chances Are," Take A Look").

As with other notable punk bands such as Bad Brains, Meat Puppets and Husker Du, the Do-It-Yourself attitude evolved into musical adeptness, thus ending an era known as hardcore and starting new pages of punk rock history.

Wool is no exception as proved with Box Set. The music is not so much revolutionary as it is appropriate due to the fact that it brings forth some moody, super-charged eclecticism to pass the time with. B (Wayken Shaw)

By Jorma Kansanen

MELISSA ETHERIDGE
Mullins Center
Nov. 19

No matter what music your into, sometimes a artist comes along that shatters those barriers of what you personally enjoy. By their sheer talent alone, they leave a unique impression, and what results is just great music.

Last Saturday Melissa Etheridge brought this concept to light, as she performed for a capacity crowd at the Mullins Center. The two and a half hour set went in three stages on this evening, as she delved into material that encompassed all four of her releases to date.

Playing upon the whole spectrum of blues, rock and country influences, the Midwest native had the raucous audience in the palm of her hands for the whole night.

The first one-third of Etheridge's show got the fans to their feet, but she seemed to be purposefully holding a little something back. Running through hits from her first two releases like the love gone bad scenarios of "No Souvenirs" and "Similar Features," Melissa slyly breathed those omnipresent pieces creating a atmosphere that inspired, as well as being able to pull upon the heart strings.

She took the low road in a understated "When You Used To Love To Dance," where the softness of the chorus touched the heart of the song's subject more effectively live than compared to the studio version.

After this portion of the show, a small bar lamp descended from the lighting structure, where underneath Etheridge took the stage to herself. With this four song acoustic set, spontaneous audience participation came to the fore during her single "Ain't It Enough" from the album Never Enough, and her classic "Chrome Plated Heart."

Shying away from typical arena rock innuendos, the "little girl from Kansas" joked around and told stories of her years living in Boston, admitting that this was a "dream come true" to go from the seafood lounge she once played in, to the stage that night.

The final stage of the show brought the electric guitars back out, and the band's intensity left nothing to the imagination. Going with the straight rock-blues realm that has been her home the last few years, Etheridge did not hold anything back as she ran the stage from end to end. From the rocker "All American Girl" to the extended blues and funk jams of "I'm The Only One" and "Crazy For Me," what she slightly held to herself in the beginning evolved into a charged-up, energetic presence, both with the music and the artist.

Winding up the set was a double shot of the thing she does best, that is belt out the bluesy vocals that would make the backbone of Andrew Dice Clay flinch. Her sell made classic "Bring Me Some Water," and Janis Joplin's "Little Piece Of My Heart," brought the crowd, and the show, to a euphoric peak. After two encores, in which she performed for the first time a new song "I Take You With Me," the impression this talented performer-singer left was something that all the fans will remember, and always will take with them. 'Witness' makes for an entertaining play

By Shawn McDonnell

WITNESS FOR THE PROSECUTION
Bowker Auditorium
Nov. 17

Agatha Christie can never be accused of subtlety.

Her doom-laden stage plays groan with the leaden dialogue from impossibly serious people, and stumble over all the quaint cliches of a George Sanders two-reeler. That's what makes them so damn fun.

Witness for the Prosecution (which played last week at Bowker Auditorium) is one of Christie's finest. It is also a wonderful return to the mystery maven from the UMass Theatre Guild, whose last Agatha outing, a ninety-fied update of Ten Little Indians, lost some of the inherent charm in the author's square forties world.

In a nutshell, Witness Is the story of one Leonard Vole (Hamish Linklater), who decides to visit an attorney (Jeffrey Jandris) after learning that he may or may not be arrested in connection with the death of an elderly woman, who may have been murdered by him. Or his wife. Or maybe someone else.

Director Jessica Blythe Richter has given this pungent, melodramatic (and wincingly un-PC) charmer exactly the treatment it deserves: a procession of somber oak-panelled rooms that all look stuffily the same (and are actually re- shuffable parts of a clever mix-and-match scenic design by Antonea Karayiannis) and a cast that knows when to overact, when to underact, and knows never to do anything in between.

Hamish Linklater, as the enigmatic drifter Vole, is low- count white trash with a raw, scrubbed face and hair that carries generations of automotive grease the way steamer trunks carry stickers. Under Richter's careful direction he plays Vole as a lovably simple-minded dope whose simple- minded passions lead him to big trouble- and deliciously indulgent courtroom explosions.

Jeffery Jandris makes the perfect foil as the defense attorney Robars, and in a role that would seem to demand particular histrionics the yells "objection" about five hundred times in Act Two) takes the definite dramatic low road.

Throughout the tense courtroom proceedings, Jandris questions in stammering monotones and keeps a white- knuckled grip on his pencil as if it were the only thing keeping him alive. He is pallid, effete (in a different place one could easily imagine him feeding flustered straight lines to the Marx Brothers) and probably the least reassuring lawyer this side of Lionel Hutz.

Of course, these disarming tactics belie a brilliant master of the courts who, alone, can save Mr. Vole from the noose. In a show like this, how could it be otherwise?

This is a hugely entertaining production with all the carefully textured inconsistencies of a great B- movie, which only works because it is so unabashedly clumsy. After the final abrupt, dramatic fade (ciniematically handled by light- man Doug Taylor) one almost expects to see "THE END" emblazoned in crackling black and white across the curtain. And like the best of those terrible old flicks, you immediately want to watch another one just like it.

dada electrifies Pearl Street crowd

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

DADA
Pearl Street
Nov. 17

In the "alternative" world there are a few bright lights seeping through the self-abusive distortion pop that seems so characteristic of that genre.

The genre was originally created to classify mostly non- genre music. Music that was rock, but was different from the glam-slam hard rock of such 80s names like Poison, Motley Crue and Dokken. Music that couldn't quite jump into any country/western, reggae, easy listening, rap or any other departments in record stores.

This "alternative music" got thrown into mostly pop/rock shelves, until some record stores just got too confused and created actual "alternative" or "modern rock" areas in their branches. One of these groups lost in the shuffle in between shelves is the L.A. trio dada.

The band performed music from their two albums on I.R.S. records, 1992's Puzzle, and this fall's release, American Highway Flower, on Thursday night in Northampton's Pearl Street nightclub.

The band immediately responded to a crowd by starting off their set with the rocker from Puzzle, "Dim." Singer and guitarist, Joie Calio, played some searing, bruising solos during the show. Solos from the new hit, "All I Am" and the song "Surround" were definitely ones to salute.

Bassist and fellow lead singer Michael Gurley seemed to be the most into the music, especially on tunes like "I'm Gonna Meet Somebody" and "Don't You Feel Me," where he stepped away from the microphone to headbang frantically.

Drummer Phil Leavitt, also occasionally lending his voice, rounded out the lineup, with a powerful tight percussion sound.

Guitarist Rob Rule, leader of the opening band going by his name, helped out dada with good rhythm guitar. Rule should join the group full time, because his band lacked a real power and substance, and relied a lot on volume.

The band themselves seemed to abandon a lot of the ethereal sounds and ambience that was a big staple to Puzzle, for a more rockin' n' rollin' sound, and also a lot of volume. One might say that it was too loud for that small downstairs part of the club.

But nevertheless, the rock music that the band members threw at the crowd was clear enough to make everyone in the audience move on the floor. A good time was had by all, especially when dada closed the night with an at first mellow, and then kicking rendition of Puzzle's opening song, "Davina." B-

13 martyrs fall in Palestine Freedom struggle

'Allahu Akbar, Death to the traitor Arafat'

■ Massacre is part of Zionist plot

By The Collation for the Defense of Palestine
Special to the Collegian

"Allahu Akbar," "Death to the traitor Arafat," "With our blood we shall redeem the martyrs."

As the people gathered for Friday prayers, anger and outraged seethed among the Palestinian Muslims of Gaza. Their dignity and freedom, so long denied to them by Israel, was now a pawn in the hands of a corrupt and despicable ruling class of PLO bureaucrats.

As the outside world breathed a sigh of relief at the coming of "peace," their future was being bought and sold like so many over-ripe oranges from a street vendors cart.

The "peace" that brought so much relief in the West, for the people of Gaza brought only continued occupation, worsening living conditions, and the humiliation of a quisling leadership, old heroes turned to traitors and criminals.

The week before had seen the "Palestinian police" thugs rounding up hundreds of young men, conducting a ruthless campaign of repression, mass arrest and torture on behalf of Israeli colonialism. The head of Arafat's goon squad, Friech Abu Middain declared last week that "From now on, nobody can demonstrate, nobody can celebrate in Gaza," without his permission.

A renewed vigor to fight the Israeli occupation, whether in the familiar form of the Gaili suiting soldiers and settlers, or in its new "Palestinian" facade, swept through the people of Gaza. As the people demonstrated their anger against the collaborators on Friday, Arafat's mercenaries faithfully following the methods of their Israeli masters, opened fire on the unarmed crowd.

Thirteen were shot down in the streets like dogs, and over 200 hundred injured. The scenes of suffering recalled the worst days of the Intifada. Ambulances and hospitals were drenched in blood, the weeping relatives sobbing outside. The Boston Globe reported that "Along the hulls, veiled and scarved women wailed their sorrow. One elderly woman sat alone, her hand raised toward heaven and, addressing God, demanded that he take Arafat because his arrival here has brought nothing but trouble."

She may soon get her wish. Arafat is increasingly seen as nothing more than the worst kind of collaborator, a super- Lahad or super-Buthelazi. His days are numbered, and his funeral will be a moment of truth in the Palestine freedom struggle.

One of the great moments leading up to Friday's massacre was when Arafat tried to attend the funeral of Hani Abed, a nationalist leader assassinated by an Israeli car bomb. The quisling Arafat was reviled as a collaborator and dog, manhandled and physically thrown out by the assembled mourners, his famous kaffiyeh head-scarf knocked contemptuously to the ground.

In revenge Arafat ordered last week's mass arrests of over two hundred nationalists. Demonstrators took to the streets chanting "Arafat, Arafat, the Jihad killed Sadat." Following Friday's massacre, even the slowest observers will have seen the extent to which he has become simply a stooge for continued Israeli occupation of Palestine and Gaza.

The Palestinian resistance, led by Hamas and Islamic Jihad, vows revenge for the killings. Hamas has been quick to recognize the true authors of the massacre – the Israelis. They had succeeded in engineering the Palestinian civil war that was always the intention behind the "peace process." "Our response will come, not in Gaza, but in the heart of Tel Aviv," one Hamas leader warned.

> Arafat is increasingly seen as nothing more than the worst kind of collaborator. His days are numbered, and his funeral will be a moment of truth in the Palestine freedom struggle.

Hamas has demonstrated its effectiveness in recent weeks with a series of daring military actions against Israeli targets, including several suicide attacks and ambushes.

These actions have given the Palestinian people living under occupation renewed hope and vigor at a time when the more traditional leadership has capitulated to the enemy completely and sold its peoples rights for cash. Along these lines, Israel announced on the day after the massacre that it was sending Arafat $13 million as a reward for good work.

Palestinians have everything to fight for. The "peace accord" signed by Rabin and Arafat gives the people none of the rights lost to Israeli colonialism. Palestinians know that they are still living only under conditions of occupation or exile, and they know that their Faiah leadership has been purchased by their enemies. A people with nothing has no choice but to fight. Palestine will fight on.

Israelis must recognize that their scheme of creating Palestinian Bantustans will not stop the freedom struggle. The creation of Bantustans did not work in South Africa and it will not work in the Middle East. South Africans did not accept partial personhood, citizenship, or sovereignty as offered by the Bantustans like Bopuiatswana and Kwa Zulu. Palestinians will not accept the Bantustans in Gaza and Jerico, either.

The past few weeks demonstrate that Israelis will pay an increasingly high price for their continuous oppression of the Palestinians. Arafat will be no more successful than they were in containing the outrage of the people, as long as the occupation continues.

Hamas leads the freedom struggle now. That much is clear to everyone, only in its actions, but in Hamas' founding document: "Mutual social responsibility means extending assistance to those who are in need," and "As the Islamic Resistance Movement paves its way, it will support the oppressed and defend the wronged with all its might. It will spare no effort to bring about justice and defeat injustice, in word and deed, in this land and everywhere it can reach."

Nationalists, patriots, activists, and all Palestinians who care for the future of their people have a clear path of struggle ahead of them under this leadership. Increasingly, the demonstrations of the Intifada will give way to conventional armed struggle with the Israelis and their collaborators. There is no future other than resistance until freedom is assured. No justice, no peace.

Hamas has inherited the leadership of the war for freedom. The blood of the martyrs shall be redeemed. Palestine will fight. Palestine will prevail.

Peru Universities defend rights through struggle

Students and professors share in revolution

■ 'Traitor! Murderer of la Cantuta!'

By El Diario
Special to the Collegian

The heightened participation of university students in the development of the People's War is another guarantee of the triumph of the Communist Party of Peru and the Revolution. In the face of this great truth, the old State seeks to displace the popular classes from the schools. By making universities the schools of the elites, the people will be denied technical and scientific knowledge.

It is cruel and despicable the attitude of the authorities of National Universities that for many months now have privatized the food (comedores universitarios), transportation, health and housing services for students and faculty. This also explains the continuous harassment of the campuses by the genocidal armed forces, that since the May 1991 intervention and others military interventions in 1992, 1993 and 1994 have looted libraries, raped female students and later assassinated professors and students (the cases of la Cantuta, Huancayo, San Marcos, UNI, Tingo Maria).

Against the military interventions, the class-conscious student and faculty bodies responded with just and correct mobilizations, showing its rejection of the old State, the genocidal armed forces and most importantly that lackey of imperialism, the running dog Kenyo Fujimori. This wretch Fujimori was able to see the proof of this for himself in San Marcos. In his tour through the University zone, the students spat in his filthy face: "Genocide! Traitor! Murderer of la Cantuta!" At the same time, vanguard students of the PCP set off various dynamite charges, that further shortened the genocidal leader's tour through the glorious University of San Marcos. In hindsight, the goal of Fujimori's murderous dictatorship in the takeover can be seen simply: the elimination of free education. It is no coincidence that a vulgar director of transportation, Mr. Quintana, finding reactionary laws in his favor, seeks to require stickers and restrict the right of half fares on Saturdays, Sundays, holidays and the first three months of the year.

In spite of this, it is not Mr. Quintana that is attacking the student community; he is only a director with delusions of grandeur. It is really the old State that is behind any measure to provoke the displacement of the people in the University. Over seventy thousand students from Ayacucho, Lima, Cusco, Puno, and Arequipa were mobilized in the streets on August 25th and 26th to protest against the old State and its reactionary measures placed in its crude Constitution.

In Lima on September 7th and 8th, there were new demonstrations targeting the genocidal dictatorship, the CCD, its "Education Commission" with Fujimori's man Rafael Rey in charge, and reactionary deans like Javier Sota Nadal, the president of the National Association of Deans and the most reactionary one of the lot.

The university students identified with the ideology of the proletariat, Marxism-Leninism-Maoism, Gonzalo Thought, which wins and defends the rights of the people in the Universities. Against the unpunished genocide of Cantuta, in defense of free education, for the unlimited right of half fares, for more funding for the universities, the class-conscious students will keep up their struggle.

One of student demonstrators stomps upon a burning U.S. flag during a protest in Manila, on Nov. 12, 1994, against a state visit by U.S. President Bill Clinton who was scheduled to arrive later that day. Police fired tear gas and water cannons to stop about 500 patriots carrying torches down a main street toward Clinton's hotel.

Wanda waited night after night, curiously wondering where that little monkey George was. Little did she know that after he had sedated the man in the yellow hat and had commandeered the Prince of Malawi's limo, the FBI was mobilized. This resulted in a 46 hour high speed chase. Tragically, the wheels of the limo spun out on a bunch of bananas that had dropped out of the bed of a produce truck, and George's limo careened into the truck of a traveling Hungarian circus. Thrown from the wreck, George, as fate would have it, landed in the monkey cage. The cage was lined with

UConn finishes UM season on a sour note

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

"See what I mean. That's the kind of leadership we are going to miss," the distraught University of Massachusetts coach Mike Hodges said at the press conference following the game.

Senior defensive end Brian Corcoran had just finished discussing the Massachusetts-type football, how much it meant to him, how much the team fought to the end.

And Hodges wanted to send Corcoran and the rest of the senior crop out with a victory in their final game. It was not to be as the Minutemen were defeated 21-13 by Connecticut on Saturday afternoon at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium in front of 7,296.

The loss moved Massachusetts' record to below .500 at 5- 6 [4-5 in Yankee Conference] for the first time since 1991, when it went 4-7 [3-5 in YanCon].

Hodges and Co., like a chunk of the other close losses throughout the season, had opportunities to win, but came up short.

"They tried to give it to us and we wouldn't take it," Hodges said. "We made a lot of errors...again. We were disappointed with the number of penalties...again..."

Especially the penalties. The Minutemen defense was penalized twice in the game's opening drive, with an offsides and an illegal procedure penalty. The ten free yards led to a touchdown drive, culminated by a Zeke Rodgers [10-17 for 150 yards] pass to Brian Reid [five catches, 74 yards] for a 29-yard score.

Connecticut	21
Massachusetts	13

Another penalty early in the fourth quarter when, with third down and one on the UConn four-yard line, Massachusetts was called for illegal procedure again. The five-yard loss pulled the Minutemen back to the nine-yard line, where Rene Ingoglia's [23 carries, 92 yards] two-yard run was not enough for the first.

PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Massachusetts safety Bryan Mooney makes a tackle here, but the Minutemen could not stop the Huskies.

Instead of the six points that would have put Massachusetts up by two, they had to settle for an Eric Oke field goal from 24 yards out, which made it a 14-13 UConn lead.

And the last drive that sealed the Husky win? Yet two more penalties. On the first play of the UConn drive, the Minutemen were penalized for being offsides. Then, with second down and three on the Husky 36, Breon Parker was called for a face mask penalty. The 15-yards pushed UConn over the 50 to the Massachusetts 49.

That set up a clever, well-executed fake-punt play. With fourth down and eleven on the Massachusetts 35, the Huskies set up to punt, but had the wide receiver Reid lined up as the punter in the formation. Reid then took the snap, and lofted a high pass in the air to the endzone.

UConn coach Skip Holtz explained that the key was the height of the ball so that it looked like a punt, that the return man would step forward. Parker was the deep man for UMass, and did just that. Instead of looking at flanker Monte Nowden sprinting on the sidelines toward the endzone, Parker called a fair catch and stepped in to about the five-yard line, only to have the pass thrown in Nowden's hands for the touchdown.

"We started practicing it a couple of weeks ago, we ran it, and it was well-executed," Holtz said. "We put in in there a week ago, and we planned on trying to use it against BU, but we never crossed the 50 to punt."

Prior to Saturday's game, defensive end Brian Corcoran looked back on the season with disappointment and pride.

"I was looking at how our program has done this year," Corcoran said. "In the five losses [before yesterday], four times we outgained the opponent. It shows a team that gets bad breaks and crazy turns. Obviously, we didn't win a championship.

"At UMass, the tradition we have, if you don't win a championship, it's disappointing. This team fought all the way, and that's all you can do."

Last game reflects season as mistakes hurt UMass

By Anthony Guido

Saturday was a fitting end to a once promising season that had become full of frustrations and setbacks.

The 21-13 loss to Connecticut [4-7, 4-4 in the Yankee Conference] completed the unexpected nosedive.

At the start of the season no one would have believed that the University of Massachusetts [5-6, 4-4] football team would be under .500 at the end. A season that began with justified hopes of a Yankee Conference title has ended with one last loss.

"We will take a long hard look at this team in the offseason, and we will do things differently next season," Coach Mike Hodges said.

The UMass program was clearly one on the rise. In Hodges' first two years as head coach, UMass was 7-3 the first year and 8-3 last season. A victory over UConn would have given UMass its third straight winning season, a feat not accomplished since 1979-1981.

"This 1994 team was a team that tried, never stopping, the effort was always there," Hodges said. "We kept making those key mental mistakes that kept us from winning football games."

UMass had at least hoped to send its senior class out with a win against UConn, but it wasn't to be. The common theme from UMass losses remained: mental mistakes, penalties and missed opportunities.

"These seniors had been great ambassadors of UMass football," Hodges said. "I really feel bad for them, they have been through a lot and we should have sent them out with a win."

Looking back: It has been a tale of two half-seasons for the Minutemen. UMass was six points away from starting the season at 6-0. Instead, the Minutemen began at 4-2 in dropping two heartbreakers on the road.

UMass lost to Richmond 14-13 in its opener, a game in which kicker Eric Oke had an extra point blocked that would have tied it late in the fourth quarter.

After three straight victories, the Minutemen faced a season-making three game road swing. The first contest was a tough 14-11 loss at New Hampshire, with UMass missing three field goals and fumbling away the ball at the goaline.

Next was a stunning 23-14 upset of William and Mary. All of a sudden, the chance to win the New England division of the YanCon were there again. Then everything fell apart as UMass lost 4 of its last 5.

The third game of the road swing was at Delaware. The Blue Hens had lost last season in Amherst and got revenge on the Minutemen this year, to the tune of 52-14. UMass was now 4-3, but with its final four games at home.

Defending YanCon champ Boston University came in and defeated the Minutemen 28-24, a game in which UMass performed well and had chances at the end zone from inside the BU 35 in the final minute.

The next week marked a noticeable letdown in a struggle to beat winless Northeastern, 27-24. UMass blew a big lead, but rallied in the fourth quarter for victory.

Minutemen drop two games to Terriers in weekend series

By Ted Kottler

The University of Massachusetts hockey team has lost eight of its first nine games as a Hockey East member, but it is not difficult to discern which of those losses were of the so-called "good" variety.

UMass scored a huge moral victory Saturday night at Boston University's Walter Brown Arena, succumbing by just a 7-4 margin following a 7-0 spiking the night before at the Mullins Center.

The Minutemen are developing the trend of performing at a much higher level in the second contest in a two-game series, the first of which was with Air Force two weeks ago. After an uninspired 5-2 loss the opening night to the Falcons, UMass fought back to salvage a 3-3 tie in the rematch.

While Dave Kilduff (career high 50 saves) turned in another gritty goaltending display in his club's first home conference clash, its attack sputtered under the burden of nine Terrier power plays, two of which went for goals.

"My team likes the big ice surface," BU Coach Jack Parker said of Mullins' Olympic-sized (200 feet x 95 feet) rink. "It's such a nicer game with so much more room out there."

BU had equally as many man advantages Saturday and cashed in twice as often, but UMass trailed only 3-2 after one period.

"We need to stay out of the [penalty] box," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "There's no way we're going to kill off penalty after penalty. At even strength we've played real well."

Parker's offensive juggernaut struck quickly before a sellout crowd of 3,806, tallying twice in the first 2:04. At 1:04, Ken Rausch netted his first score of the year past Brian Regan (career high 40 saves), on assists by Jacques Joubert and Mike Prendergast.

One minute later, Chris Drury converted via Regan's five- hole from Rich Brennan and Mike Sylvia for a 2-0 BU lead.

Sophomore David Kilduff turned back 50 shots, but the Minutemen still fell to No. 3 Boston University 7-0 on Friday.

Warren Norris beat rookie goaltender Tom Noble at 7:11 for UMass' first goal against the nation's 3rd ranked team. Team scoring leader Rob Bonneau (four goals, two assists, six points) and Gerry Cahill set up Norris' third goal in 1994-95.

UMass hockey fans appear in record numbers

By Anthony Guido

Regardless of the outcome from the weekend's home and home series, the University of Massachusetts hockey team and its fans matured and learned a great deal.

UMass [0-8-1, 0-5 in Hockey East] may have lost both contests to Boston University, but what matters most is what is taken out of the experience.

"As frustrating as it can be playing BU, this program began only 14 months ago and now here we are having played them in our building," Mallen said.

The Mullins Center was host to the first Minuteman- Terrier match-up on Friday night. In its first two home contests of the year, UMass had drawn 2,575 and 2,225 fans. But this was BU, the first Hockey East opponent in Mullins, the pre-season No. 1 team in the nation to boot.

6,218 fans came to Mullins to cheer their Minutemen against the conference's top team. The total is the largest hockey crowd ever at Mullins. Mallen had anticipated and would have been pleased by a crowd of over 3,000.

"I am thrilled. The fact that we got over 6,000 people to watch us play in western Mass. is great for this program," Mallen said.

More that just the sheer number, the Mullins crowd was very loud and enthusiastic. BU had traveled 50 or so fans, who came to UMass ready with the common Hockey East spirit. The UMass fans responded, proving to be true hockey fans, cheering their underdog team and the finer points of the game.

> "The support of our fans is something that will be extremely important to UMass. Our program took a big step tonight, and so did our fans."
> —Joe Mallen

"Tonight it felt like we were playing in our home arena, this kind of attendance is what we need," captain Jayneen Rissling said. "The fans were there for us from the beginning to end."

On the ice, the Minutemen gained experience while playing the team widely considered to be the most talented opponent on the schedule. The obvious weakness was the tendency to take too many penalties, with UMass allowing five power-play goals to the Terriers on Friday night.

Boston University certainly represented a very difficult Hockey East home opener, but in some ways the right team to have to open the conference season at home against.

UMass volleyball beats West Virginia, falls to Rhode Island in A–10 tourney

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

One of the most successful seasons ever may have come skidding to a halt for the University of Massachusetts volleyball team this past weekend.

The Minutewomen entered the Atlantic 10 tournament in Duquesne Friday with the league's third seed, and were able to defeat No. 6 West Virginia 15-12, 11-15, 15-9, 13-15, 15- 11 in the first round, before falling to the second seeded University of Rhode Island Rams 6-15, 15-11, 10-15, 13-15 on Saturday.

UMass was eliminated from the tournament, but the Minutewomen now have a 26-5 record, and will have to wait and see if they will receive an at large bid to either the NCAA Championships or the National Invitational Volleyball Championships.

In the semi-final match on Saturday, UMass tangled with URI, who they had upset in the first round of last year's A- 10 tourney, but unfortunately for the Minutewomen, this year the Rams, now 18-10, had a different idea.

URI, who had a bye in the first round due to their No. 2 seed, got the jump on UMass early. The Minutewomen, coming off the tough five game win over West Virginia, saw themselves behind 1-7 in the first game, and could not make a comeback.

In game two, UMass trailed again, this time 7-11, before putting together a streak to win the final eight points of the game. Serving from both sophomore outside hitter Dionne Nash, an All Atlantic 10 selection, and freshman outside hitter Lesley Nolan, whose 14 digs led the team, keyed the comeback.

The Minutewomen led game three 11-7 at one point, but could not hold on, and also scored six straight points to grab a 13-10 lead in game four, before the Rams took over, winning the next five points in a row to take the game and the match.

Sophomore outside hitter Giza Rivera led the team with 19 kills, and also collected 12 digs, but it was not enough for the Minutewomen. Freshman Leigh Readey also had a solid game for UMass, garnering eight kills and no errors for a .615 hitting percentage. The middle blocker also collected nine blocks in the match.

Senior Cass Anderson, playing in what could be her final volleyball match as a Minutewomen, collected 40 assists and 10 digs.

In the first round match, UMass fell behind early to the Mountaineers (11-23) in game one, and trailed 1-7 before coming back to take the first game 15-12.

They lost game two, and once again trailed in game three, before coming back to win that game. After being defeated in a close game three, 13-15, UMass was able to put it together in the fifth and deciding game.

Junior defensive specialist Beth Cabral started things off on the right foot for UMass. Behind her serving, the Minutewomen were able to grab a 6-3 lead, and never trailed, going on to the grab the win, 15-11.

Rivera once again led UMass in kills, this time with 23. She also collected a career high 23 digs. Rivera, another All A-10 selection, has led the team in kills 22 times this year, her first season with the Minutewomen.

Nash had another solid game [17 kills and a career high 22 digs], while Nolan had a team high 33 digs, and collected 18 kills.

Anderson had a season high 66 assists with 27 digs, her career best, and freshman Michelle Pactorek chipped in with eight kills and a .467 hitting percentage.

The Minutewomen will have to wait until bids for the NCAA or NIVC are announced to see if their season has come to a close.

Minutewomen find positives in loss

A 25 point loss is usually a bad thing.

For the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team, however, losing to the Italian National Team 71-46 Friday night in an exhibition game was encouraging.

In the last four games the Italians have played on their American tour, they have won 108-74 (St. Bonaventure), 82- 39 (Robert Morris), 101-59 (West Virginia) and 86-53 (Duquesne).

Italy	71
Massachusetts	46

"We felt like we made a good statement against this team," UMass Coach Joanie O'Brien said. "People are going to have to look at us and say 'Hey, maybe this team is for real.' I feel like we did that tonight because that was a very, very good basketball team.

"They had some girls do some things that you almost had to clap for. They were skilled. [Their big players] could all catch and shoot. They could all wheel to the basket. That's how good they were. We may not play anybody that has this total team quickness that this team has. It was a good test," O'Brien said.

The Italians will probably be the tallest team UMass plays this season, with the smallest player checking in at 5-foot-8. Eight out of their 12 players were over six feet. Even with that distinct height advantage, the Italians only outrebounded UMass, 36-30.

"They were so big. It was a tough challenge. For us to only get outrebounded by six wasn't too bad," O'Brien said.

Junior All-America candidate Octavia Thomas was the leader on the boards for the Minutewomen grabbing a total of seven rebounds, second best in the game. She also scored eight points, shooting a perfect 4-4 from the field.

"I was pleased with Octavia," O'Brien said. "She played a solid game."

Junior All-America candidate Melissa Gurile scored a team high 17 points and was 9-10 from the foul line.

The exhibition was also the debut for three UMass newcomers. Tez Kraft, Sabriya Mitchell and Kara Tudman each logged over 20 minutes in the game.

"I was very happy with all three of them. I thought Kara did an awful lot," O'Brien said. "She's going to give this team a lot. I was very, very happy with what Tez did, she played within herself and Sabriya was solid. I think we played our best basketball when the three of them were on the floor with Melissa and Octavia."

Mitchell dished out six assists but also turned the ball over 10 times. "It took her a while to get going. She was rusty," O'Brien said. "It was rust, but she got it off."

The Minutewomen were down 20-4 early on in the first half but pulled within 10 points with 4:17 left when Mitchell delivered a pass underneath to Thomas who put it off the glass to make it 27-17. The Italians then went on a 10-0 run to make it 37-21 at the half.

Italy started the second half with a 14-6 run but a Thomas basket off a fast break at the 10:53 mark started a 10-1 run for the Minutewomen, cutting the lead to 52-37. UMass made it 58-43 with 4:20 remaining on a Beth Kuzmeski jumper but would not get any closer from there on out.

Sophomore Crystal Carroll was hampered with an ankle injury, only playing 18 minutes, but blocked a team high two shots.

"The kids felt like they made a statement tonight in this game. If we kept things respectable, do a good job defending and keep them down in numbers, people are going to look at this score and say 'this team is for real.' I think that's what they wanted to do tonight and they did a good job with it," O'Brien said. "[But] we still got a lot of things we need to work on."

Study addresses sexual assault claims made about male athletes

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

Male athletes may be more likely to be involved in cases of sexual assault on college campuses than non-athletes, according to a study in which two University of Massachusetts faculty contributed.

"When the two data sets are viewed concurrently, athletes appear to be disproportionately involved in sexual assaults on college campuses," according to the study which will be published in the Journal of Sport and Social Issues in May.

The study was conducted by Todd Crosset, an assistant professor of sports management and Mark McDonald, a lecturer in the sports management department at the University, along with Jeffrey Benedict, a graduate student at Northeastern University in Boston.

Results of the study were presented Nov. 10 at a meeting of the North American Society for the Sociological Study of Sport in Savannah, Ga.

"This [study] was done to get some rigorous research about this issue," Crosset said.

The study was done in part to address claims made by the media that male athletes commit more sexual assaults than other male students.

Crosset said the common statistic of one in three sexual assaults being committed by student athletes is based on "bad research."

"What the study does," Crosset said, "is show that we have a problem. It demonstrates the need to address that problem and study it further."

The study included attempted rape, unwanted touching of intimate parts of another person, or the use of threats or intimidation to gain an advantage in nonconsensual sexual contact.

The study is based on information obtained from police records and the judicial affairs offices at 30 National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) Division I institutions.

A total of 107 cases of sexual assault were surveyed in the study.

UMass is a Division I school.

The study used statistical analysis to test the relationship between varsity athletes and sexual assaults reported to police or judicial affairs offices.

The study's findings show that for the institutions reporting, male student–athletes comprise 3.7 percent of the total male student population and represent 5.3 percent of the reported sexual assaults to campus police.

For the combined three years of data from the 10 judicial affairs offices, male student–athletes consist of 3.3 percent of the total male population, but represent 19 percent of the assaults reported.

Statistical analysis shows that in reported sexual assaults to campus police there is no significant difference, only 1.6 percent, between male student athletes and other male students, though athletes are slightly over–represented.

The reports from judicial affairs offices, however, does reveal significant differences, 15.7 percent, between male student athletes and other male students.

According to Crosset, reporting a sexual assault to police is different than reporting one to a judicial affairs office.

Filing a complaint at a police station is the beginning of the judicial process.

At a judicial affairs office, the rules of evidence are less severe, anonymity is protected more, justice can be swifter, and the punishments are less severe, Crosset said.

The difference in how the institutions handle their complaints may explain the differing statistics, Crosset said.

"Hopefully our research will shift the nature of the debate concerning athletes and sexual assault from questioning whether we have a problem in athletics, to asking why this problem exists," Crosset said.

The institutions were promised confidentiality, and the names of the participating colleges and universities are not included in the report.

The researchers caution that conclusions based on the data are necessarily limited.

"For example," the study states, "to draw conclusions as to the frequency of sexual assault committed by athletes would be a misapplication of these findings. Further, it needs to be reiterated that it is not clear if the association between athletic affiliation and sexual assault is casual or the result of behavior only indirectly related to sport."

Crosset said an athlete's drinking habits is one example. He said athletes sign a contract not to drink during the athletic season, but perhaps they drink more during the off– season.

"Maybe this is not athletic, per se," Crosset said, "but something indirectly related to it."

Records were collected from 20 campus police departments and 10 judicial affairs offices. The police records were for the 1992–1993 school year; information from judicial affairs offices covered the academic years from 1991–93.

"We had to make sure we would get a high response rate from the police," Crosset said.

Those participating in the study were asked to provide the number of male students enrolled, student–athletes enrolled, sexual assaults reported, and sexual assaults reported that involved a student–athlete by cross referencing the names of the accused with names on college athletic rosters.

According to Crosset, the research was unfunded. If they had access to some funding, they may have been able to pay college police and judicial affairs offices to go back further and get more sexual assault cases to study, thereby providing more accurate data.

"To ask someone to go back a couple of years makes things more difficult," Crosset said.

Benedict was unable to be reached for comment.

Planes bomb Serb airfield and artillery

NATO officials said the main mission was to limit casualties

By Aida Cerkez
Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — In its biggest airstrike ever, NATO retaliated Monday for repeated Serb attacks on a U.N. safe haven by bombing an airfield in a Serb-controlled section of Croatia.

NATO commanders said the raid knocked the Udbina airfield out of commission for 30 days. The airfield and its artillery batteries have been used by Serbs in recent weeks to terrorize residents of government-held areas of northwest Bosnia.

A Croatian commander said only two runways were damaged by the midday airstrike and that they could be repaired as early as Wednesday.

The airfield is 22 miles southwest of the U.N.-designated safe area of Bihac.

In Washington, a Pentagon official said the mission's intent was to temporarily disable the airfield, not destroy it. NATO officials said they wanted to limit casualties.

A little more than 20 American warplanes participated in the mission of about 30 aircraft, the Pentagon official said on condition of anonymity. The planes included F-16C, F-15E, and F-A-18D attack planes.

The planes bombed Serb antiaircraft artillery and surface-to-air missile sites first, and then the airfield. NATO reconnaissance planes did a damage assessment.

In addition to the U.S. planes, Jaguar and Mirage jets from Britain, France and the Netherlands crossed the Adriatic for the airstrike, NATO's seventh since the Bosnian war started in April 1992 and the alliance's first in neighboring Croatia.

"Initial reports are that the strike was successful," said Adm. Leighton W. Smith, NATO commander for southern Europe.

Serb surface-to-air missiles were fired at the NATO planes, but he said all warplanes and 20 support aircraft returned safely to their bases in Italy.

The U.N. commander for former Yugoslavia, Gen. Bertrand de Lapresle, requested that the NATO warplanes target runways and taxiways — not destroy aircraft, Smith told reporters in Naples, Italy.

"Our intention was to try to limit collateral damage," Smith said.

"We did not want to go outside of that airfield area, and we wanted to limit the number of people on the ground who might be casualties as a result of the strike."

Slobodan Jarcevic, an aide to Croatian Serb leader Milan Martic, asserted that two villages north of the airfield were destroyed, "and it is assumed that all civilians that were in those houses were killed." There was no independent confirmation.

After the raid, Croatian Serb troops seized two Czech U.N. soldiers and threatened to kill them, Jarcevic said. The United Nations said the two were later released, but anti-U.N. hostilities remained high.

Smith said the raid wasn't meant "to put the airfield out of commission for an awfully long time. If we had wanted to we would have taken out all the aircraft, the ammunition."

Croatia's air force commander, Col. Inra Agotic, said the damage to two runways could be repaired in 48 to 72 hours. Agotic also said about 20 planes and 10 helicopters were destroyed or damaged. The airstrikes actually may play into the hands of Bosnian and Croatian Serbs. Since they have been attacking Bosnian government lands jointly in recent weeks, an escalating cross-border conflict might pressure Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic to help the Serbs.

Milosevic cut off most aid to Bosnia's Serbs in August in exchange for eased international sanctions on Serb-dominated Yugoslavia. He continues to wield influence in Serb-held parts of Croatia.

Senior U.N. envoy Yashushi Akashi said Monday that he and Milosevic would meet Wednesday with Martic, who condemned the bombing.

Akashi, the top U.N. official in former Yugoslavia, insisted the NATO airstrike was a "necessary and proportionate response."

And President Clinton said: "It was a strong and entirely appropriate response. That airfield has been used to conduct the air attacks against the Bihac region. It was the right thing to do."

Contributions make better holidays

AMHERST — For some, holidays are not considered the most joyous of occasions.

The Amherst community is making an effort to cure the "holiday blues" by assisting those who may feel dispirited throughout the festive season.

Community centers, volunteers and student organizations are all pitching in to make this Thanksgiving one to remember.

The Amherst Senior Center will hold a free dinner on Thanksgiving day, and the Amherst Survival Center, which regularly offers daily free meals, will make a Thanksgiving dinner available.

"Our holiday meal is a well–known tradition in Amherst," said Nancy Pagano, assistant director of Amherst Senior Center. "It adds to the meaning of Thanksgiving."

The Amherst Senior Center has held Thanksgiving dinner annually for the past 20 years. The event is dependant on community donations, and has always been very successful, Pagano said.

The center supplies individuals an alternative location when they may have families that live far away, families they do not get along with, and some that may not have families at all, Pagano said.

"This is a comfortable place they always know they can come to," Pagano said. "The staff here are like family."

Twenty or 30 people attended last year, and meals were delivered to shut–ins, Pagano said.

The Amherst Survival Center will hold a dinner at the First Congregational Church on Main Street. It has offered a Thanksgiving dinner annually for the past 18 or 20 years, according to Edwina Askew, coordinator of volunteers for the Amherst Survival Center.

Last year approximately 65 people attended, some of which were volunteers from the center and the community, Askew said.

"We always have a nice turnout and a nice crowd," Askew said.

The dinner is held for those who are homeless, who may not have any family or access to food, and center workers and volunteers, Askew said.

The Survival Center's pantry, made up of canned goods, is stocked through the Not for Bread Alone program, which will contribute to the Report releases list of toys which don't bring children joy, pleasure

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

MassPIRG will be giving a report today in Northampton of 24 toys considered dangerous to warn parents before the holiday season.

"Toys are supposed to bring children pleasure and joy," said Assistant MassPIRG Director, Moire Murray. "But too often they bring pain and sometimes death."

According to a report released by MassPIRG, there were at least 36 children that died in toy–related injuries from January 1993 to September 1994. Approximately 61 percent of these deaths are a result from choking.

"There are choke tubes sold by the Consumer Products Safety Commission," said Campaign Director of MassPIRG Kim Nelson. "We go out shopping for toys for children under three, and look for toys that fit into this little tube."

Murray said it is not only toys for children under three, but toys with "play value."

"Play value is basically bright colors," said Murray. "Even if it has a label (children three and up), but it has play value, it is considered illegal."

The MassPIRG report said toy manufactures will place the "children under three" label on the packaging just to get around the Safety Commission's small parts regulation, even though it is obviously intended for a young child.

Although 20 of the 24 toys considered dangerous are because of choking, four of the toys are dangerous because of sharp pieces, noise hazards and personal injury. One product is dangerous because it contains hazardous toxins.

"For example, [Mattel] Gak Splat," Murray said. "When it dries up, it crystallizes and can cut children's hands. That is a problem regardless of the children's age."

According to Murray, the toys were mostly analyzed by the Washington office of U.S.PIRG, but chapters across the country helped in the testing.

because more toys are bought during this time of year," Murray said. "The parents should be aware that because products are on the shelf, they are not always safe. The first 11 toys on the list are just plain illegal."

Murray said the ninth annual report is nationwide, and not only makes consumers aware, but hopefully pressures the Safety Commission and toy manufacturers to have stricter regulations.

"Larger companies like Mattel are pushing for weaker standards," Murray said.

Toys considered choke hazards are those that fit (or have parts that fit) into a tube 1.25 inches. The report lists toys including small balls, toy figures and balloons.

Other toys are noise hazards. For example "Blaster Balls," which create a loud explosive noise, and a nail polish containing toluene, a toxic substance.

Theater Project brings up issues

'Silence Is Never Golden' lets talent break women's silence

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

In the title song of "S.I.N.G." — "Silence Is Never Golden," performed Sunday night at Bowker Auditorium, there is a line that speaks directly to the goals of the Women's Theater Project, the play's producer: Your silence will not protect you

Homophobia, racism, sexism, rape, divorce, sex and suicide are all issues that affect human lives, particularly the lives of the six women who make up the cast. These six African-American lesbians and bisexuals perform a work that breaks the silence surrounding these issues.

A combination of music, dance, performance art, and theater, "S.I.N.G." was originally produced by the Women's Theater Project in Somerville, and performed as part of the Boston Center for the Arts 1993 Residency Program.

The Women's Theater Project was founded in 1986 as a community feminist theater to address issues that affect the lives of women. One of the main goals of the Project is to give a voice to those who have traditionally been forced into silence — women of all ages, races, classes, backgrounds and levels of experience.

The cast of "S.I.N.G." reflects the aim of the Project. Ranging in ages from 23 to 44, the women of "S.I.N.G." vary in experience from the sometime theater worker to the seasoned professional. Before working on the show, some of them had never acted before. Others had been involved in performance for years. One thing that they all have in common is a desire to tell the stories of their lives as African-American lesbians and bisexuals.

In the second of the show's 10 skits and songs, "Am I Too Black?," the cast explores the complex issues faced by African-Americans in a White-dominated society. Living and working with their Black friends and family, the most ordinary things — the way they talk and dance, the specific shade of their skin, the texture of their hair — can suddenly become suspect. "Am I Black enough?" they ask themselves.

Conversely, out in the White-dominated society, they may be forced to make choices about how they present themselves, how they dress and the kinds of music they can listen to. If they are not careful, they may end up asking themselves, "Am I too Black?"

Part of the show was a three-part series on the various aspects of lesbian relationships, including flirting, committed relationships, and sex. In "Butch/Femme," a well-dressed "femme" comes home from work and prepares drinks for her and her "butch" lover. When her lover arrives, they begin to plan their anniversary and change clothes for the evening. By the time they are through, the "femme" is in pants and a leather jacket and the "butch" is dressed to the nines in a tight black dress and high heels. The skit points out that roles are not always rigid in such relationships.

Several times during the show, individual cast members took to the spotlight and delivered monologues on their personal life experiences. They broke the silence and exposed their experiences with mother-daughter relationships, parental divorce, breast cancer, suicide and spirituality.

One woman told the story of how she found out who her father was. She had always known her mother's husband was not her father, but when she finally got up the nerve to ask her about it, she got an answer that she did not expect. She was the product of violence, her mother told her. The result of a rape committed 18 years before and buried in silence.

How could she deal with this knowledge? How could she vent the anger that raged through her heart and threatened to tear her apart? One of the ways is by breaking the silence and exposing her experience in front of an audience.

The audience appreciated the honesty; they filled up almost the entire auditorium. People came from many different places and, true to the goals of the Women's Theater Project, many different racial, ethnic, economic and personal backgrounds. Local women, UMass students, and members of several local communities — African-American; gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender; and theater — all came to hear the seldom-voiced perspective of "S.I.N.G."

"S.I.N.G." was sponsored by the Program for GLB Concerns, the New World Theater, the Five College Multicultural Theatre Committee, the UMass Multicultural Advisory Board, and the Office of the vice chancellor for student affairs.

New alcoholic drinks stir up controversy

By Robert W. Trott
Associated Press

BOSTON — Mothers Against Drunk Driving squared off against the liquor industry Monday over new twists to an old method of selling alcohol — nip-sized shots in gelatin and test tubes. The novelty "single service products" aroused MADD's attention for two reasons, spokesman Richard Shire said. Their snappy packaging appeals to youngsters, and they can be easily consumed — in the car — after purchase.

"The dollar is what's the motivating factor here, and not the concern for public safety, which is our motivating factor," Shire said at an informational hearing of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Commission.

"I think this is just aiding and abetting minors who want to drink," Shire said.

Commission Chairman Stuart Krusell called the hearing to determine if the state should regulate sale of the products. Alcohol industry representatives disputed Shire's accusations. Raymond Byrd, vice president of the Cocoa, Fla. firm Tooter Lingo Liquers, which sells pre-mixed drinks in test tubes, said they are sold to retailers in packages of 30, and are not designed to be sold individually.

Shire and Krusell said some retailers sell the tubes individually.

Each test tube has an alcohol warning on it, as the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms requires, Byrd said. John Lingo, president of the Mango Bottling Inc., the bottling and distribution firm that owns Tooter Lingo Liquers, said the pre-mixed drinks were intended for adults, and were often too sweet for minors or drinkers looking to get drunk.

"In order for someone to get intoxicated off our product, they would almost go diabetic before getting intoxicated," Lingo said. Richard Sanetti, president of Tumblers Inc., which makes packages of gelatin spiked with alcohol, said they were sold warm to discourage immediate consumption.

He said Tumblers began marketing gelatin shots, a longtime staple at many fraternity parties, to respond "to a niche in the marketplace."

Sanetti and Byrd both said their products met all ATF regulations, and contained less alcohol than "nips," the single-shot bottles associated with airlines. And they denied they were aiming their products at minors.

"This is just not the kind of thing that people are going into stores to buy to get drunk," Byrd said.

The three-member alcohol oversight commission did not make a decision whether to take additional steps to regulate the single-shot drinks. Any new regulation would have to be approved by Gov. William Weld.

"There's a fairly wide range from doing nothing to getting rid of them," Krusell said. "It's under advisement."

Amherst Survival Center and Not Bread Alone, McKinney said.

There are 25–30 volunteers on the project. Each volunteer takes a one-hour shift to answer questions and accept donations on the bus, McKinney said.

"We've had few people stop by to drop off donations," said Jeff Cullen, a residence director and VIVA volunteer at UMass.

"And about double that stopping by to ask questions about what's going on and what to donate," Cullen said.

New encyclopedia edited by professors

By Rana Meyer
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts English professors Charles Moran and Joseph Skerrett have edited the literature section of the newly released Encyclopedia of English Studies and Language Arts.

Moran, a member of the College Committee of the National Council of Teachers of English, and Skerrett were asked to work on the project by the editor-in-chief of the encyclopedia, Alan Purves.

"It seemed like an interesting project and I was looking forward to working with Joseph Skerret," Moran said. "The encyclopedia covers the developments of teaching of literature in the recent years."

Skerret is also the editor of the Multi Ethic Language Studies Journal.

Both professors also work on the UMass Writing Project with elementary school teachers.

According to Skerret, the encyclopedia goes in depth.

"It contains critical subjects on multiculturalism, representatism and post-colonial literature," he said.

It took them 18 months to complete their work on the encyclopedia. Moran said he thought the whole project moved along pretty quickly — even with all of the recruiting, editing and revisions that they had to do.

Skerret said this encyclopedia will help graduate students the most.

"It is a great place for them to start," Skerret said. "The definitions are good and clear for people who are just starting to do research in the field."

Skerret also said this encyclopedia is good for professors, school boards, and department heads who were educated 20 to 30 years ago so they may be updated on new terms and definitions.

Some of the articles contained in their section of the encyclopedia include topics of reading, assessment testing, speech, rhetoric and writing, media and computer use in English.

According to Moran, they focused on general topics instead of specific authors because it would have taken up the entire encyclopedia and a lot of things would not have been covered.

The English studies part of this encyclopedia was geared more towards colleges and upper secondary schools, while the language arts was geared towards kindergarten and up.

When putting this section together, they worked with many UMass professors and staff who were chosen from colleagues and former students. English Professor Peter Elbow was one of the professors who contributed to the entires.

Elbow said he was willing to write for this book because he thought that it would be very useful.

"I think that these articles can help students, though the main audience is the teachers," he said. "The teachers will be able to get a clearer selection of material, especially in new fields like composition and literature."

In the encyclopedia, Elbow wrote articles about free writing and voice.

Another contributor to this production was Lee Edwards, dean of the college of humanities and fine arts who wrote articles on women's literature.

Edwards said he hopes students and other readers will find the articles useful.

"I was interested in doing the piece because women's literature is a fairly new literature category and I thought that it might be fun to take a crack at defining it," Edwards said.

The encyclopedia was published in September and will be available in most schools and libraries. Each article sums up a broad topic into a small space and give the readers an overview to help them find further things to study.

There will be two volumes which will makes up about 1,400 pages containing about eight different sections.

The encyclopedia is being published by the College Committee of the National Council of Teachers of English as a reference book in conjunction with Scholastic Incorporated.

Notes from the Basement

Okay, so we're finally back to normal and Wednesdays are Wednesdays and Fridays are Fridays. Phew, glad that's over. But...wait just a minute. We have Thursday and Friday off this week. So when will we have those days? It's November of my senior year and I still don't understand the logic behind this day switching.

Why are we the only University in the world that replaces a Wednesday with a Friday? And why doesn't anyone ever tell anybody until the day before? Ahh...UMass logic. Gotta love it.

Pre-registration for Spring 1995 ends today at 2 p.m. Don't miss the deadline, because if you do, you'll end up trying to pre-register for classes during Add/Drop. Not a fun thing.

Everyone always says "pre-reg early so you can get the good classes." For me, it goes along the same lines as the holiday shopping theory. People who pre-reg early are like the people who have their holiday shopping done by Halloween. Way too organized.

People like me, who wake up a half an hour before the pre-reg deadline, frantically run around looking for their pin number and flipping through the book at light speed to find classes, are like people who finish their holiday shopping the morning of by going to Dairy Mart and buying $20 worth of Bazooka. A little disorganized, but at least it gets done.

Then, there are the people who miss pre-reg altogether. They are the people who give you a holiday present in June. Its gets done, a little late and when everything works out it's a pleasant little surprise.

The demands for a siren to signify hockey goals at the William D. Mullins center have grown fierce. Groups of siren advocates are planning to storm the center with airhorns and a list of demands...heading the lowering of snack prices and more free Buffalo wings from the Ground Round.

Well, it's not exactly that fierce, but that little light above the net just doesn't cut it. Then again, if the siren only went off for UMass goals, it would've been pretty silent last Friday night. It was a good showing, but there's no way around it. We got shellacked by BU.

While we are on the topic of sports, just let me beat a dead horse for a second. Trivia question. Name the only field hockey team to beat the two teams in the National Championship game? Well, I'd tell you it was UMass, but you already knew that.

Why is there always a project going on around campus? There has not been a moment in all of my academic career here that streets haven't been torn up, bulldozers attractively decorating the lawns, or fluorescent orange cones pointing the way to a detour that might or might not lead you to your destination.

When will the campus finally be fixed? Twenty years from now, I'll come back to visit and there will still be dump trucks dotting the scenery and the Silvio O. Conte Polymer Research Center will probably still be closed.

Incidentally, when is that damn building going to open? Or is it already? You would think that with all the cash that has been sunk into the building, there would be some kind of celebration or ceremony for the opening. I mean, c'mon they had a ground breaking ceremony for it, attended by Gov. William Weld. Oh, that's it, he forgot there's a state university out in Western Mass. Even though I'm from Boston, I forgot that the state politicians think the state ends at Worcester.

Silly, me.

By the way, if anyone has tickets to the Arkansas Razorbacks-UMass Minutemen matchup this Friday night in Springfield, I have some nice crisp green ones for yuh.

I guess I'll just be sitting at home Friday night, mowing down popcorn and watching the Minutemen win on ESPN.

Go. Go U. Go UMass. Go UMass.

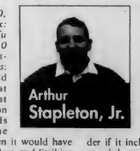
The best classes to take at UMass

Daling away your future. It's that time again at the University, and by now I'm sure that each and every student is flipping through the pre-reg guide, making a last minute effort to find good classes. Well, like I did a semester before this, here are some helpful hints from a veteran as to which classes may float your boat.



French 280, Love and Sex: French Culture, Tu lecture, 4- 5:30 p.m., Th discussion, three credits: This class could represent what happens here at the University on many weekends throughout the semester. But then it would have to be renamed, Beer and Striking Out.

Honors 392G, Ghosts That Haunt Us, MW lecture, 4-6 p.m., four credits: Yes. I like Casper. How about the Ghosts from Christmas' Past, Present and Future? I wonder if Patrick Swayze and Demi Moore will be guest lecturers. I saw Ghostbusters 12 times when I was a kid. Naaah, probably too difficult. It is an honors class, you know.

IIRTA 220, Travel and Tourism, TuTh 8-9:15 a.m., three credits: Cool. I wonder if you get to walk around town, wearing Amherst t-shirts, buying Amherst postcards and taking pictures of every weirdo in sight. Is asking for directions a requirement? Do we get to hop on the bus for a field trip to the Hampshire Mall?

Biology 107, Plant–Animal Similarities, MWF 9:05 a.m., three credits: Hey, that geranium looks like an elephant! Wait a minute. That's not an elephant — it's a giraffe. And that cactus resembles a porcupine if you look really hard.

What does a Chia Pet classify as, though — a plant or an animal?

Computer Science 192D, Tap Seminar, M 3:35–5 p.m., one credit; This course is for first–year students only: This would have been an incredible way to get used to weekend atmosphere in Amherst. They teach to how to tap the bottle and twist the cap.

You'll also learn how to box people out on the way to the keg. Yet I still wonder if it includes how to put that special tap on a beer ball. Remember, pump while you are waiting and the kegmaster will fill up your cup next.

Animal Science 359, Horse Management, MWF 11:15 a.m., four credits: I could teach this class. I like the five and the six horses for the daily double. Never pick the favorite because you can't make enough cash. A field trip to the Kentucky Derby would be cool.

This class would cost too much for me.

Classics 499Z, Honors Senior Activity, By Arrangement, one credit: I didn't know I could get a credit for tailgating, going uptown, stressing about getting a job, writing resumes and blowing off classes.

Wait a minute. I got 15 credits for doing that last semester.

Geology 101, The Earth, MWF 9:05, three credits: It's round...No, it's flat...Duuuude, I'm telling you, maan. It's round...

Entomology 511, Insect Behavior, TuTh 1–2:15 p.m., three credits: "Uhh, how do you please to these charges? Huh– huh, saw off his tweeter?"

Honestly, I want to study the "behaviors of insects analyzed in view of current experimental research." Why can the spider get along with the beetle and the lady bug?

Serious stuff, I know.

Anthropology 100, Human Nature, MW 10:10 a.m. with a discussion section, three credits: Now, is this the Michael Jackson version or the one from SWV? I think Mike's was better, just because it was from Thriller. However, the finger nails give SWV the edge in the minds of many.

Philosophy 392S, Space and Time, TuTh 2:30–3:45 p.m., three credits: Now, isn't that what a lot of students do anyway? Take up space and waste time. Sounds like a perfect class for some of my friends.

PE G88, Figure Skating I, MW 2–3:15 p.m., one credit: Oooh. That's gotta hurt. Whoaah. He's struggling now. Only if he hit that triple–axel, double–flip–while–eating–a– cheeseburger earlier in his routine.

I'd be all set if I'd learned how to stop when I was a little younger.

PE G89, Figure Skating II, TuTh 2–3:15 p.m., one credit: I guess this is the advanced class. Do they teach you how to hire a man to stand behind a curtain with a lead pipe, stalk your opponent, then, when she's least vulnerable, attack her and take her out, only to see her come back two months later and beat you by winning the silver medal in the Olympics?

Just a thought.

Memory of a fallen leader

Andrew Trodden

Thirty-one years ago today, at 12:30, the great leader of this nation, John Fitzgerald Kennedy, was shot dead by assassins' bullets. That event quickly became one of the greatest tragedies this country ever saw, not to mention one of the greatest mysteries.

The Warren Commission felt that there was no such mystery. That with the result of their report, they had dispelled any questions that one may have on the validity of the bogus story the American public was asked to swallow. That story, a fictional one for sure, was that Lee Harvey Oswald, acting alone, shot Kennedy from a sixth floor window of the Texas School Book Depository.

I have done numerous hours of research on this topic in my life, and I am not afraid to say that I probably possess more knowledge on this subject than the average citizen. But one need not stress themselves out researching this to understand that this case is, by no means, closed. One need look no further than Oliver Stone's award winning film, JFK. While parts of this film may be fictitious, a dominant portion is the God's honest, cross the heart and hope to die truth. After viewing this film, even a chimpanzee would walk away with the realization that something "smells fishy" about the whole case. The whole enchilada reeks of conspiracy and cover-up.

What? A conspiracy and cover-up? That's right folks, a massive conspiracy followed by a widespread cover-up. A cover-up that, if done a little tidier, could have been pulled off. But with all the loose ends and unexplainable events, this attempt at hoodwinking the American public was no more than meager.

So this proposes the question — who exactly attempted to pull the proverbial wool over the eyes of America? Well, who would be powerful enough to conceive this cover-up and at the same time do so with such vigor so as to make sure that the evidence of a conspiracy never saw the light of day?

How about the American government. Though they may not have immediately been a part of the conspiracy to assassinate Kennedy, they certainly wouldn't want America to know that their line of defense was infiltrated by a couple of insurgents with rifles. Therefore, when they orchestrated this cover-up, they themselves became accomplices, after the fact, to the whole conspiracy.

Apparently the government holds truth to the old adage, "if you can't see it, it must not be dirty." Well, I think it's high time the government gives us a full view and let us decide just how dirty things are, and whether they need cleaning or not. This is, after all, "a government of the people, by the people, for the people."

Obviously this man was important enough to have many things named in his memory: a space center, a library, many memorials, and numerous schools across this country, including a dorm here at UMass. They even built a huge memorial at his grave site and lit a flame that will burn eternally in his memory.

Now while all of this is a fine and beautiful way of remembering Kennedy, I believe it to be a futile attempt on the part of the government to ease the pain and suffering that Americans fought through during the years following his death. Certainly the government couldn't have thought that all of this was good enough to appease the inquisitiveness of Americans everywhere.

A wise man once said, "to do the right thing for the wrong reason is the greatest treason." Now after all that was done in memory of this man, you can't convince me that Kennedy wasn't important enough to know the truth surrounding the sorrowful ending of his life on earth.

J. Edgar Hoover once stated, "Over the long run, the public cannot be fooled." Well, Hoover, you were right. Thirty-one years is a long run, and we, the public, are not fooled.

Professor apologizes for students' anger

To the editor:

I deeply regret any pain that may have been caused to any students athletes in the African–American community on the UMass campus as a result of a disclosure that occurred in my media criticism class earlier this month. I was unaware that such a disclosure was to take place and feel that it was an unfortunate violation of the privacy of some students on campus.

I only hope that some good can come from the revelation that such a list exists.

Gay Pride Day really helped

To the editor:

On behalf of the Gay Awareness Day coordinators, I would like to offer a most gracious thank you to everyone involved. The amount of support was incredible.

Perhaps days like the ones past will not be needed in the future. We can look hopefully to the time when everyone will be living openly and aware of LBGT issues, not only for one day, but everyday.

It takes both queer and straight communities working together to achieve this level of awareness. Until the ignorance and hatred are erased, visibility and awareness will forever be limited. The closet hurts and limits everyone. Thanks again.

Feminism is beyond 'politically correct'

To the editor:

I am writing in response to the article written by Tara Ruelle on Nov. 14, regarding the distorted meaning of feminism. To begin, I would like to say that I understand her distorted view of feminism and why she felt the need to write the article. I was also sorely disappointed with her lack of representation of the true meaning of feminism.

In her article she perpetuates the idea that feminism is a "militant, self–centered movement" and that "typical feminists" are "man–hating individuals." She claims that her reasons for not "thrusting" herself into the movement is because she doesn't fit the stereotypical mold.

Well, Tara, I too am a woman who has learned how to be strong and self–motivated by my father. But I am not so naive that I do not see his faults or his involvement in the system.

I am not a man–hater and I am not a lesbian, but I am a feminist. Does that seem typical? What exactly is a typical feminist?

I believe in the idea that there can be equality between the sexes and that it is an uphill battle. My major problem with the article was the idea that she would not join the movement because it is not socially acceptable.

Well, the movement to stop segregation in the '50s was not exactly embraced with open arms by this nation, but without the brave individuals that pushed it through, where would we be today?

If all people simply supported everything that was politically correct at the time, this nation would run just to keep in place. I am tired of running.

I am going to walk proudly through this world and I am going to support women and human rights until something changes.

My true meaning of feminism is the idea of working for peace between men and women. I am working for equality. I will accept the negative stereotypes that come with being a feminist; and I will accept them proudly until I have the power to set them straight, or until there is no longer a need to call myself a feminist.

Latest Star Trek a worthy adventure; The Professional flunks

By Jon Lupo

STAR TREK: GENERATIONS
Directed by David Carson with Patrick Stewart, William Shatner
Brent Spiner & Malcolm McDowell

After the last reassuringly hokey Star Trek sequel, you'd be hard pressed to find any film critic who thought there was life left in the Trek filmography. After reaching its creative peaks with The Wrath of Khan and The Voyage Home, some bonehead let William Shatner write and direct The Final Frontier, a dopey sequel where the cast goes to find God and finds out he's a lot like the wizard of Oz (pay no attention to the cheap special effects behind the curtain!).

The franchise redeemed itself with the follow-up, The Undiscovered Country, a benignly entertaining romp that was no more than a glorified TV episode, complete with fraying costumes and geriatric has–beens saving the universe (again, ho–hum).

But with the injection of fresh blood, namely the "Next Generation" cast of regulars, the latest Star Trek adventure, aptly titled Generations, proves there's life in this universe. As directed by "Next Generation" veteran David Carson, Generations proves a smooth transition for the new cast.

Unlike the first Star Trek movie, there are no endlessly ponderous shots of the Enterprise and showy special effects — the film plunges into its adventure with absolute efficiency. And it's a remarkably entertaining ride — funny, thrilling and even a bit profound; one of the most ebullient times I've had at the movies in quite a while.

There's a wonderfully old–fashioned sensibility that the film taps into, merging Industrial Light & Magic special effects with the genre conventions of Westerns and matinee serials.

Ultimately, that's where the lasting appeal and the effectiveness of Star Trek lies — somewhere between high camp and serious science fiction, kitsch and techno–jargon.

Let's face it: when the pop–cultural stakes are this high — there's a Star Trek Mastercard for chrissakes — you either boldly go with it or not. For nay–sayers, there's plenty of fuzzy sci–fi logic to pick over, but if you do go with it, the pleasures are numerous.

From the marvelous performances of Brent Spiner and Patrick Stewart, to some groovy f/x and plenty of in–jokes, this is one voyage of the Enterprise you won't want to end. B+

THE PROFESSIONAL
Directed by Luc Besson with Jean Reno, Natalie Portman
Gary Oldman & Danny Aiello

Writer–director Luc Besson follows up La Femme Nikita with his first American effort, a fitfully interesting jab at fusing brutality and sentiment.

Trying to upend gangster/action movie cliches with the same slickness that powered Nikita, Besson only half–heartedly succeeds, ending up with an intriguingly enigmatic central character amid a sea of flying bullets and fervent overacting.

Jean Reno is a simpleton hit man who takes in a young girl (Natalie Portman) after her family is gunned down by rogue D.E.A. agents, led by an obnoxious Gary Oldman. She wants to be a "cleaner" too, mainly to avenge the death of her younger brother, the only family member she really loved.

The Professional works whenever Reno is on screen. Playing the simple–minded hit man with a subtlety not usually associated with your average "let's kick some butt" action hero, Reno makes even Besson's throw–away character traits the loves Gene Kelly movies, drinks excessive amounts of milk, etc.) seem to ring true.

But his performance is ultimately in vain. The Professional invests the relationship between Reno and Portman (a tiring, weak performance — she should take a cue from Kirsten Dunst's mesmerizing turn in Interview With the Vampire) with an uncomfortably charged sexuality. Only it's so calculated that it doesn't resonate, seeming more like a empty gimmick.

But that's the whole problem with The Professional. It's too frequently just a series of empty gimmicks, overshadowing some even its more laudable contents: namely, some impressive stunt work and an indelible performance by Reno.

You have to wade through a lot of silly excesses to get to the (comparably) good stuff in The Professional. Whether it's Gary Oldman's hysterically out of control villain or a plodding, unsatisfying finish, the film adds up to less than the sum of its parts.

While it's probably worth taking a look at on video, where the small screen may tone down Oldman and spotlight Reno, The Professional misses the hit in the theaters. C

MIRACLE ON 34TH STREET
Directed by Les Mayfield with Richard Attenborough
Elizabeth Perkins & Mara Wilson

Jean Reno plays a hitman and Natalie Portman is his young protege in The Professional.

I'll tell you a little secret. I've always preferred the original 1947 version of Miracle on 34th Street over the more lauded Christmas classic It's a Wonderful Life.

I'll take the snow–lined streets of Manhattan and the gleaming, '40s art–deco style of Macy's department store over the whiny denizens of Bedford Falls any X–Mas season. Now that I've alienated two–thirds of the public, let me say that I was just as wary about this John Hughes–produced update as if It's a Wonderful Life was being remade with Keanu Reeves.

Hughes, if you'll remember, yanked heart–strings and raked in cash as the man behind Home Alone. So it's a surprise when this remake, directed by Les Mayfield (Encino Man, but don't hold it against him), proves to be a worthy successor to my old favorite: it's almost as schmaltzy, sentimental and shameless as its predecessor.

Inexplicable Oscar–winning director Richard Attenborough (Ghandi), fresh from Jurassic Park, plays the department store Santa who claims to be the real thing.

Elizabeth Perkins is the cynical store executive who teaches her daughter (Mrs. Doubtfire's Mara Wilson) not to believe in Kris Kringle. And Dylan McDermott (In the Line of Fire) is the lawyer who's not only defending Santa in court but also in love with gun–shy Perkins.

Like any other Christmas tradition, Miracle follows through on its proven premise. There aren't any surprises, but there are plenty of cute moments (courtesy of professional cutie–pie Wilson — sigh) and pseudo– inspirational claptrap about having faith in things.

It's a given to say that anyone without the proverbial heart of gold will find Miracle a treacly sapfest. And it nearly does overstay its welcome — the film is about 10 minutes too long. Yet it's also a blissful, aw–shucks reminder of what's really important at Christmas time: old–fashioned commercialism. B

Faculty Dance Concert dazzles Smith audience

FALL FACULTY DANCE CONCERT
Mendenhall Center for the Performing Arts
Smith College
Nov. 18

Smith College presented its annual Fall Faculty Dance Concert Nov. 17–19 at 8 p.m. in Theater 14 at Mendenhall Center for the Arts at Smith College.

The Friday night performance played to a full and enthusiastic audience that clapped and cheered after each piece.

The program included five pieces choreographed by faculty members Susan Waltner, Rodger Blum and Guest Artist Jin–Wen Yu.

Dancers from the five colleges performed along with Waltner, Yu and visiting artist William Seigh.

Jin–Wen Yu choreographed and performed two pieces, the meditative solo "Free and Easy Wandering" and the athletic trio "Latent Heat," a definite highlight of the evening.

His style in both pieces was fluid, graceful and strong.

The solo combined elements of modern dance and Tai Ji Quan. Chinese Opera. Dance had an almost flirtatious quality as Yu played to the audience.

The trio involved much cooperation among the dancers, as well as balance and agility, as they rolled, jumped and suspended over and around each other.

Susan Waltner's work "November" opened the show with a somber view of approaching winter as experienced by a "late cricket."

Dressed in flowing white, Waltner portrayed winter winds blowing in on an anxious cricket.

The piece was accompanied by the spoken poem "Late Cricket" by Robert Francis.

Waltner's other piece, "In Search Of . . . ," was a playful exploration of themes of desire, coming together and apart, and loneliness.

The dancers read personal ads and twice looked out into the audience pointing out potential interests.

The tone of the piece was sassy and daring, and the dancers performed with skill and attitude to music by the Turtle Island String Quartet.

Closing the concert was "Memory Palaces," choreographed by Rodger Blum and set to the music "Sextet" by Aaron Copland.

In this dramatic piece, the dancers, in simple earth–toned costumes, moved among arches in the background and overhead.

Although the dancers were committed and energetic, the piece lacked focus of flow and the movements were often incoherent.

It was a somewhat disappointing ending to an excellent concert.

Christmas movies target young and old this holiday season

By John Horn
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — It's warm, fuzzy and jolly and arrives in shopping malls at Christmas.

It's the holiday movie season.

From Arnold Schwarzenegger's comic turn as a pregnant man to Michael Keaton and Geena Davis as dueling speechwriters, feel–good laughs are the trend in another particularly competitive holiday season.

"Christmas movies are about laughs," says John Pasquin, the director of The Santa Clause, the just–released comedy starring Tim Allen. "But you have to feel a little gooey at the end."

Since many families come together at Christmas for the only time all year, Hollywood is courting them with movies geared to all–together–now outings.

On Friday alone, Disney re–released The Lion King, 20th Century Fox gives A Miracle on 34th Street a modern–day makeover, and the two Enterprise captains collide in Paramount Pictures' Star Trek: Generations.

"Families are looking for something to do together," says Ivan Reitman, who directed Schwarzenegger and Danny DeVito in Junior.

The director says the movie, opening Wednesday, can be enjoyed by all of Reitman's children — aged 17, 13 and 6.

Says Pasquin, the father of sons aged 4 and 7: "It was really important for me to do something both kids and parents could enjoy. People like to go out with their kids and go see a movie over the holidays."

What seems to work best this time of year is a fusion of comedy and emotion.

The result is often naked sentimentality, but if that's what the audience wants, so what? Look at Home Alone.

The fourth highest–grossing film of all time came out in the winter of 1990, and it was heavy with gushy, uplifting emotions.

To make sure audiences leave theaters upbeat, MGM at some expense re–shot the ending of Speechless, which romantically links Keaton and Davis.

The movie's theme is that love can bring together two people with divergent political beliefs. (Any similarities to the James Carville and Mary Matalin romance are coincidental, MGM says.)

"This is light romantic comedy that makes you feel good," says Ron Underwood, the film's director and the maker of City Slickers.

"It's definitely not a political story," he says. "It takes place against a backdrop of a political campaign, but these two characters could be in the advertising business or in the textile business."

In the reworked Miracle on 34th Street, a new antagonist emerges, making Kris Kringle's (Richard Attenborough) struggle more gripping, and mom (Elizabeth Perkins) has a new set of contemporary worries.

Writer–producer John Hughes says less than five percent of the dialogue from the 1947 original remains. "It was in that 1940s lingo — it just didn't ring true," Hughes says.

"It's really interesting," Hughes says of the new version. "If you run it side by side with the original, most of it is changed. But the (new version) feels the same — it embraces you."

In Junior, one of show business' biggest action stars becomes pregnant in a novel science experiment.

Great with child, Schwarzenegger's character becomes a more sensitive, complex person.

"I thought the concept was a liability, and we're finding it a liability right now — it sounds too gimmicky," says Reitman, noting that male moviegoers may also find the premise troublesome. "But I think there is a lovely emotional core to it that gives it a depth the concept doesn't tell you about."

lot of playing time, but if she does get the minutes, she will be a blocking threat. Kuzmeski will need to be more consistent from three point land, against the Italian National Team she only made one three pointer in four tries.

Newcomer Sabriya Mitchell will also be an important factor. The sophomore showed flashes of her unlimited potential against the Italians but must commit fewer turnovers against the Lady Kats.

The Minutewomen bench will play a big part in the outcome too. Freshman Tez Kraft and Kara Tudman will be looked upon to spell Gurrle and Thomas and grab some rebounds. Tricia Hopson and Nicole Carter both will be looked upon to give UMass solid minutes.

O'Brien believes that if her team comes ready to play, they will have a good chance in the tournament.

"I'm looking forward to getting to Kentucky and playing them, and whoever we play in the second round. I think it will be fun," O'Brien said. "We're going to have to come ready to play but we look forward to it. We'd like to take home that first place trophy if we could."

Opposition to Proposition 187

By William A. Davila
Collegian Correspondent

PROPOSITION 187 ELECTION RESULTS

NO:	3,197,409	40.8 percent
YES:	4,624,825	59.2 percent

Two weeks ago California voted "Yes" on Proposition 187. Proposition 187 will, if enforced, discriminate against minorities.

The proposition will seek to exclude undocumented immigrants from any public social services, public health care and public elementary, secondary and post secondary education. In doing so, however, it will discriminate against anyone who is a "reasonable suspect."

The proposed law, which has been publicly supported by California's Governor Pete Wilson, is primarily targeted towards Mexican immigrants. In the Nov. 21 issue of Time magazine, Governor Wilson is quoted saying "The people of California have passed Proposition 187. Now we must enforce it." The Time magazine article also quotes Barbara Coe, co-chair of the initiative for the proposition, saying, "We have to defend ourselves against invaders."

According to a pamphlet from the Registrar of Voters of Santa Ana, California, Proposition 187 is also supported by the Pioneer Fund, an organization whose members and supporters claim "genetic superiority" of the white race.

Proposition 187 is not only the problem of immigrants or Mexican-Americans, nor is it only the problem of the state of California. Anyone who does not look White, or whose surname does not sound White, or "American," or who speaks with an accent, is a potential victim of harassment and discrimination which a comparably small population elected (4.6 million out of a total population of 30.4 million, according to the California Internet Gopher).

Although the proposition itself only affects California, feelings of resentment towards minorities and race relations could be affected as people become divided on this issue.

The legislation demands that anyone suspected of not being American should be reported. Is it fair to Latinos, Asians, African Americans or other people of color to be interrogated and treated like a common criminal every time someone "suspects" this person of being an illegal immigrant?

As police brutality against minorities continues in the United States, Proposition 187 is now providing police with a reason to harass anyone they choose. Even with the recent Rodney King incident, the world witnessed how minorities are considered dispensable by our own courts.

No longer will police need to claim they suspected an individual of committing a crime, to justify approaching them. They will be able to stop any individual simply for not looking American.

Proposition 187, Section 1: "Findings and Declarations" is hostile and racist against immigrants. This section states that "economic hardship" is the result of immigrants in the United States. It makes no mention of other contributing factors that affect the economy. It overlooks evidence that shows that immigrants are not an economic burden. The statement in Section 1 will only incite resentment against Mexicans and other minorities.

Section 1 also states the following: "[People of California] have suffered and are suffering personal injury and damage caused by the criminal conduct of illegal aliens in [California]."

This statement is very generalized and racist, and creates a negative image of immigrants. Many immigrants do come to the United States to earn a legitimate living and live in accordance with the laws. With this proposition, the government's campaign against immigrants, using them as scapegoats, is evident. The blaming is such that one might forget that there are immigrants that are humane and productive citizens in our society. It is not fair to accuse an entire group based on the actions of a small percentage.

The governor of California and the proponents of Proposition 187 exhibit much ignorance and irresponsibility. They have failed to take into account the repercussions of their relentless assaults on the immigrants of the United States.

The proposition emphasizes the fact that the government of California will not provide any type of aid to immigrants because it claims immigrants are an "economic" burden. Yet, in contradiction, it states the following in Section 3, 114. "Any person who uses false documents to conceal his or her true citizenship or resident alien status is guilty of a felony, and shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for five years or by a fine of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000)."

The claim of "economic hardship" is apparently not relevant when the opportunity to incarcerate yet another minority arises. How is it that five years in prison is a more economically efficient solution than mere deportation. Isn't this, after all, the true intention of Proposition 187.

In fact, it is not the true intention. One can argue with much validity and truth that Proposition 187 serves to intimidate and harass immigrants (whether illegal or not) in hopes of discouraging entrance into the United States.

This is again obvious in Section 7, 48215(d). The section states the following: "[E]ach school district shall also have verified legal status of each parent or guardian of each child."

This deviates from the supposed intention of the proposition. Once the citizenship of the student is confirmed, making him or her eligible for free education, why is it necessary to confirm the rest of the family. The student is the one receiving the aid.

With Proposition 187 the government will do to immigrant children what they would imprison an individual for doing to their own child: it will neglect them and take their welfare for granted.

The state of California will be authorizing health institutions to deny undocumented children essential care, such as immunization, because this type of care is not an "emergency," as stated in the proposition.

By the same token, HIV testing, breast cancer, Tuberculosis, venereal decease testing, prevention education, treatment and other types of screening would be denied because they are not emergencies, according to the Voters Registrars pamphlet. They will deny prenatal care even though research shows that prenatal care cost one third of the expenditure of unavoided complications, or emergencies, during pregnancy.

It is astonishing that 4,624,825 voters in California support such racist and oppressive views today (California Internet Gopher). Fortunately, a federal judge issued a ten day restraining order halting the implementation of Proposition 187 and the issue is continually unfolding. The Nov. 21 issue of Time magazine reports that a San Francisco superior court judge stopped an order to expel over 300,000 students in public schools and universities.

Where do Puerto Ricans belong?

Charles Venator-Santiago

After Nov. 19, 1593, within twenty-something years of the Spanish invasion and conquering, and subsequent colonization of Boinken, the native Taino people had been exterminated.

In 1521, the island was renamed Puerto Rico, with its capital called San Juan Bautista. With the approval of the Catholic Pope at the time, Africans were imported into the island, so as to work the copper mines of the island, and farm the land. The Catholics, including the celebrated Fray Bartolome de las Casas, argued that the Africans could not be Christianized (unlike the docile "cannibals"), but rather were "physically" more fit to be what the Dominican Francisco de Victoria would perhaps have called a natural slave.

Since that period on, although there were various local uprisings and other acts of resistance against the Spanish and the criollo elites, mainly by cimarrones, a few leftover Tainos, some jornaleros, and most importantly the pirates, participated in the first "major" collective claim to a nationhood on Sept. 23, 1868.

Perhaps echoing El Grito de Dolores, and El Grito de Ipiranga, the Puerto Ricans had most notably challenged the repressive economic conditions, as well as the other cultural customs of the Spanish, and other elites, with El Grito de Lares. The movement, which claimed the medical doctor Ramon Emeterio Betanes as its leader, was the expression of one of the most important demonstrations of solidarity from Latin America to Puerto Rico. History has demonstrated that this insurrection was "squashed" by the actions of a sellout, a chota.

Following this attempt, El Grito de Yara in Cuba, "claimed" its success on Oct. 10, 1868.

It is not until 1897, when Spain by demand of the Puerto Rican gentry, extended parliamentary rights to Puerto Rico. It allowed the island to become a province of Spain, at least under the auspices of La Carta Automatica de 1897.

This legislation was nullified on July 25, 1898, when Puerto Rico welcomed the liberators and the bringers of democracy (with the exception of "El Aguila Blanca" and his posse).

Further, in the Treaty of Paris of 1898, Puerto Rico was "ceded" to the United States as war booty, making Puerto Rico territorial possession, acquired through war, not an island to be colonized.

The viewpoint that the island was not to be colonized was shared by many illustrious figures including General Nelson Miles who believed the Puerto Ricans were too ignorant and barbaric to become a people, either as members of the United States or as members of Latin America. They needed to be educated and empowered before they could become mature adults and be considered humans.

Likewise, President Woodrow Wilson used to believe if they are in the United States they are citizens and if they are outside of the country they are children that need to be guided. This idea reigned during the Insular Cases of 1900.

In the Insular Cases it was made clear that Puerto Rico, or rather Porto Rico, was an "unincorporated territory," unlike Alaska, Texas, Hawaii, New Mexico, California, Florida, as well as other war booty which the United States collected throughout the region, and appropriated to make states in due course.

It is also the same understanding which allowed the United States to construct a second class citizenship, based on the understanding that Puerto Ricans were two-thirds Spanish and one-third Black, therefore not fit to be United States citizens.

This history continues up to 1952, when Puerto Ricans chose to remain a territorial possession of the United States, for there is no such thing as a Commonwealth in the parts of the Constitution which govern the island. Even the Supreme Court has declared that such use of language is a mere rhetorical play of words.

Within this context it is clear that Puerto Rico has never chosen to be part of Latin America. On the contrary it has either sought to become part of Spain, or has currently, part of the United States. In political terms, and by this it does not mean the government only, Puerto Rico has chosen to remain a territorial possession of the United States with a second class citizenship.

It is peculiar and sinister how some Puerto Rican administrators in the United States, as well as other individuals, suggest that Puerto Rico is part of a Latin American discourse. Yet, much more sinister and hypocritical is the claim that Puerto Ricans should be part of the multicultural debates when Puerto Rico is not even a state within the United States of America; much less are Puerto Ricans equal citizens, nor should they be citizens at all.

Puerto Ricans, whether due to fear, ignorance or selfish reasons, among many others, as people, have not chosen to be an independent nation. Its leaders have institutionalized repressive laws, strategies and agencies to murder, marginalize and persecute those who believe that Puerto Rico should be a free nation, free to make its choices. These ideas have been carried on by those who defend statehood as well as the current territorial status.

By contrast there are those who argue that Puerto Ricans should be included in the "multicultural" discourse, as members of the Latino "community." In the process of imagining their communal membership, these nefarious, or rather "sellouts," are legitimizing a repressive order which has institutionalized the current condition of the island.

These "multi-cultists," who make money in the name of our condition, are not questioning our identity as Puerto Ricans, they merely seek to reform the internal order of the state which perpetuates the condition of Puerto Rico. In the profit they make money, write books, and live off the idea of Puerto Ricans without a Puerto Rico.

How can anyone claim that Puerto Rico is part of the Latin American discourse when Puerto Rico continues to be an "unincorporated territory"? How can Puerto Ricans claim a seat in the multicultural bandwagon, ignoring Puerto Rico?

Perhaps the answer lies in that these individuals imagine their identity, as Puerto Rican, without a Puerto Rico. To be sure in many instances the possibility of a free Puerto Rico is a threat to their status quo, as well as a obvious disregard of their discourse.

The 1994 Women's Conference will be held on Dec. 3 at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Auditorium from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

The conference entitled "Voices of the Majority: Women Against Oppression" will feature two keynote speakers. The morning session will begin with a talk by Ninotchka Rosca, who is a world-renowned writer and activist. She is the founder of GABRIELA Network, a Philippine-U.S. women's solidarity organization. Rosca will address the issue of sex trafficking in her talk "We Are Not For Sale: Sex Trafficking in the World."

The afternoon session will begin with a talk by Alette Belance, known as Mother Courage in Haiti. Belance is an activist with the Lavalas in Haiti, the peoples' movement that swept Reverend Jean Bertrand Aristide into office in 1991. On Oct. 16, 1993, Belance was kidnapped from her home by gunmen and taken to a body dumping ground, where she was brutally beaten and left to die.

Belance survived and has been granted asylum in the United States. She will address "The Crisis of Democracy in Haiti."

Conference organizer Wairimu Agua said, "As a woman from Kenya studying in the United States, I have often noted the myopic and ignorant attitude of Western feminists. They are quick to point to how bad it is for us in the so-called Third World, while actively partaking in the perpetuation of the systems that oppress us."

In addition to the two distinguished keynote addresses, there will be four panel discussions. "Women in the New International Order: The Struggle in Context" will focus on the increasing importance of the United Nations as an organization for legislating policy and maintaining law and order in the world. This panel will feature noted journalist Dr. Barbara Ninri Aziz who will discuss the effects of the sanctions on the population of Iraq and Dr. Aziza Al Hibri who will address the notion of global sisterhood, and the upcoming International Women's Conference at Beijing in 1995.

The "Women and Health Care" panel will discuss issues such as AIDS, lack of prenatal care, and the lack of proper immunization for children. The speakers will include Dalila Balfour, an AIDS prevention activist who will discuss the socio-economic and political implications of AIDS and Naleena Narain, director of the Asian Task Force Against Domestic Violence.

Juliana Hupkins, conference organizer, said, "We seek to emphasize liberation struggles that go beyond issues of self esteem, sexuality and body image. True empowerment is achieved when there is a recognition of the structures of oppression and a desire to confront and destroy them."

The "Women From Developing Nations" panel will discuss the problems of underdevelopment and its impact on the lives of women in Asia, Africa and Latin America. The panel will focus on the grassroots movements and liberation struggles that have occurred in developing nations. The panelists will include Dr. Tsehay Berhane Sclassie, who is a noted scholar and activist from Ethiopia. Berhane, who is with the Institute of Advanced Studies at Princeton University, N.J., will discuss the impact of war on the populations of Africa.

"Crisis in the Cities" will focus on the increase in violence, drugs and destitution in the inner cities and its impact on the lives of women. Panelists include Esparansa Mortel, a Puerto Rican activist who was involved in the Puerto Rican Independence Movement and is organizing in the efforts to free political prisoners.

Safia Bukhare, once member of the Black Panther Party and Black Liberation Army, will also speak. A political prisoner herself in the struggle for Black liberation in the United States, Safia will discuss the state of political prisoners in our prison system and the recently approved crime bill.

The conference organizing committee consists of diverse groups including African Students Association, POWER, Valley Women's Voice, Forum on Developing Nations, Asian American Students Association, Anti-Racism Coalition and the Graduate Women's Network.

The conference is free and open to the public. Individuals can pre-register on Nov. 21, 22, 28, 29 and 30 or call (413) 545-5512. The conference committee is also soliciting any art work that women want to exhibit.

America's prisons: disturbing prophecy

By Michelle Lugo
Collegian Staff

Who are America's prisoners?

"Minorities represent 31 percent of all arrests, and 41 percent of all drug-related arrests. Minorities are convicted more often and are sentenced for longer term than non-minorities for the same crimes, especially for drug offenses" (according to information compiled by several campus organizations and obtained from American Bar Association Annual Report on the State of the Justice System, Feb. 1993; Journal of American Medical Association, Jun., 1994; Maoist International Movement Notes, Dec., 1991).

Last week was Prisoner Awareness Week. The occasion brought various campus organizations together in an attempt to awaken the concern of the campus community towards the problem of rampant incarceration in the United States. Among the participating groups were the Radical Student Union, the Office of Third World Affairs, Anti-Racism Coalition, Cannabis Reform Coalition and The Liberator, and others.

The reasoning behind imprisonment is to isolate and control those individuals who are a menace to society. However, the American prison system has come to a dilemma felt by everyone from politicians, to citizens, to the prisoners themselves. The dilemma is due to overcrowding; the "jailhouse" is becoming a warehouse.

"[U.S. prisons] now hold five prisoners for every four which they could handle. In these overcrowded conditions diseases such as AIDS and Tuberculosis are spreading. Health care in prisons is sub-standard, and those diseases are spreading into the general population as prisoners are released. What is even more dangerous, is the behavior and values which our citizens are learning in prison — hate, fear, racism and aggression," according to the compiled information.

In Massachusetts it is estimated that 10 years ago "8200 inmates filled state and county jails that were originally built to contain a maximum of 6,400 prisoners. The state has spent about $1 billion over the last decade on three prison expansion projects to reduce the overcrowding. Now, about 19,100 inmates occupy space intended to house 14,000 prisoners," said an article written in On Phoenix, Mar. 25, 1994.

Overcrowding is not the only reported injustice suffered by inmates. Other claims made by imprisoned individuals are inadequate legal assistance, sub-standard health care, sub-standard living conditions, mental and physical torture. In an actual letter by an Indiana Control Unit prisoner the individual complain of "dehumanizing body search every time a prisoner is let out of his cell by feeling on the genitals and between the buttocks...[of] beatings...[and of] using illegal biological spray on prisoners which causes the skin on your body to peel off," said the compiled information pamphlet.

Caught up in these conditions are the prisoners. If minorities make up the biggest percenage of inmates then it is their community who feels the side effects of the whole criminal justice system. Individuals belonging to minority communities might be signaled out as the potential criminals.

There are those citizens who believe very strongly that the prison system works. There are individuals who say they find comfort in knowing some odious and sinister person who broke some sacred law — they killed, maybe robbed someone's property, maybe raped — is jailed. There is even a popular expression which says "that person deserves to be locked-up."

However, prisons are not filling up with murderers, rapists and thieves. Non-violent drug offenders make up a large percentage of the prison community, serve the longest terms, and are the fastest growing prison population. According to an American Bar Association report, the American justice system is on the brink of a collapse as the country fervently prosecutes drug offenders while arresting fewer violent criminals.

In the Seacoast Times for Sept. 1994, it said: "Americans have paid billions of tax dollars and an immeasurable price in lost rights to support a government program that actually creates crime. That program is the war on drugs. Our prisons are crammed to overflowing with first-time, non- violent drug offenders. The sad reality is that the vast majority of drug 'crimes' hurt no one but the user."

The sad reality is that crime is not decreasing even if the number of prisons are increasing. With such clear evidence it is expected that other measures for deterring crime would be explored. Instead the government is concentrating on the punishment not prevention. Billions being spent on new prisons when data shows what human beings need is rehabilitation.

ARIES (March 21-April 19). Financial matters need prompt assessment. Avoid impulsive moves, however. You must keep your spending down. Evening hours look especially rewarding.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20). Finalize a business arrangement during the early morning. A friend who has a health problem needs advice; be frank but offer encouragement.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20). Play a lone hand in financial matters. Distant affairs look promising. Be prepared to travel. Dear face-to face with those who work far away from your base of operations. Reward loved one's dedication.

CANCER (June 21-July 22). People in authority need to know what you have in mind. Write a brief letter or memo setting forth your goals. Unless circumstances change, a romance could be coming to an end. Be philosophical.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22). Be more sensitive to key allies and their plans. Council plans could be changed at the last minute. Place more emphasis on getting your proposals in writing. Personal affairs take precedence. A financial decision is made in your favor. Deal from a position of strength.

My eyes teared as I hacked my desert dry cough at the road dust that swirled up from behind the passing semi. Yes, I was lost... a long way from the rotting New York cul-de-sac I had called my home. Why HAD I eaten that moldy bread. Why DID I let that circus bear break my heart.

Arkansas looms as a big test for UM

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

The prospect is a daunting one.

When the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team opens its season this Friday night, they will take on the No. 1 Arkansas Razorbacks at the Springfield Civic Center.

The excitement surrounding Massachusetts basketball this year is rooted in the fact that the team's five starters and all of the key subs from last year's Atlantic 10 championship team are returning.

Although the hype surrounding the Minutemen may be enormous, it hardly compares with the expectations surrounding Arkansas, as Coach Nolan Richardson has five starters and key subs returning from his National Championship squad.

The Razorbacks are not being modest about their chances either. They intend to win it all and they will tell anyone who will listen.

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

The Minutemen will need a big night defensively from Marcus Camby if they hope to beat the Razorbacks.

"At their Midnight Madness, Nolan introduced the team as the 1994–95 National Champions," said Massachusetts Coach John Calipari. "But they have the type of team that can back it up."

Calipari believes his team will be up to the challenge when game time arrives.

"I think we'll be okay," Calipari said. "There's only one way for us to play, and that is to play UMass basketball, and I think our players know that."

To have any chance for success against the Razorbacks, the UMass Minutemen must shutdown Arkansas' inside–outside future NBA combination of Corliss Williamson and Scotty Thurman.

In Arkansas, where professional sports play nowhere nearby, the Razorbacks have captured the interest of every sports fan in the state, including most notably President Bill Clinton. Before even entering the University of Arkansas, Williamson was a high school legend.

As Arkansas made its run, that eventually led to the National Championship, Williamson became a state hero. In fact, the city of Fayettville had a "Corliss Williamson Day" following last season in honor of the NCAA Final Four's Most Valuable Player.

The hype around the "Big Nasty," as Williamson has been dubbed, is not unfounded. At 6–foot–7, 245 pounds, he is a stalwart inside. Williamson averaged 20.4 points and 7.7 boards in the extremely competitive Southeastern Conference. In addition to the NCAA honors, Williamson was also named the Conference's Player of the Year and a second–team All–America.

Thurman can burn opponents in a variety of ways, most notably either slashing to the basket or burying three–pointers. Thurman shot a blazing 42.9 percent from behind the three–point arc en route to a 15.9 scoring average last season.

Perhaps Thurman's greatest asset, though, is his ability to perform in the clutch. With 51 seconds remaining in the National Championship game against Duke, it was Thurman who stepped up and knocked down a three–pointer that would untie the game and seal the victory for the Razorbacks.

Both Williamson and Thurman will be crucial for the Razorbacks' bid to repeat.

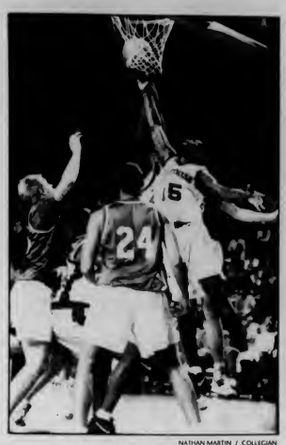
Calipari said that it is not just Williamson and Thurman that worries him.

"For us, every matchup is important," he said.

The Minutemen will be without guard Mike Williams, who will be sitting out the final game of his three game suspension. Calipari said the Minutemen will miss Williams at crunch time.

"He'll be missed," Calipari said. "Especially if it's a close game and we have the ball in the closing minutes for the last shot."

The absence of Williams, and any foul trouble, will mean minutes for guard Andre Burks and forwards Tyrone Weeks and Inus Norville, none of whom has played a collegiate game.



NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

Lou Roe will have his hands full against Arkansas' Corliss Williamson.

"We have to go with them," Calipari said. "I hope they step up."

Massachusetts versus No. 1: It was almost exactly a year ago (Nov. 29) that the Minutemen got their first ever shot at a top ranked team when they faced the North Carolina Tar Heels in the Final Four of the Preseason National Invitation Tournament. The upset further moved Massachusetts into the national spotlight. Calipari points to one major difference between this year's battle with No. 1 versus that of a year ago.

"Arkansas will be ready for us," Calipari said.

The University of Massachusetts as a whole is a surprising 2–1 against top rated teams so far this year. The field hockey team upset North Carolina 1–0 in overtime on Oct. 9 and the men's cross country team finished ahead of No. 1 Georgetown earlier this season at the Paul Short Invitational. Football fell to perennial powerhouse Youngstown St. on Nov. 12.

Minutewomen journey to Lady Kats Invitational

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team will be opening its season this weekend when it travels to Lexington, Ky. to take on Kentucky at the Lady Kats Invitational.

The Minutewomen will play the Lady Kats on Friday in the second game of the tourney while the first game pits St. John's against Eastern Michigan. The winners of the two games will play in the championship game on Saturday after the consolation game.

This will be the first meeting ever between Kentucky and Massachusetts.

Last year, Kentucky Coach Sharon Fanning's team finished with a 17–11 overall record, 5–6 in the Southeastern Conference (SEC), finishing in seventh place.

This year, Kentucky is young with about four or five freshmen on the team. The Lady Kats lost two starters and five letterwinners from last year.

"They're fairly young," UMass Coach Joanie O'Brien said. "They've got a couple kids coming back and they've got quite a few newcomers."

Senior Stacey Reed is the top returning player. She averaged 18.2 points and 6.8 rebounds per game last year.

Also returning for the Lady Kats is senior Karri Koach and junior Christina Jansen. Jansen averaged 7.6 points and 2.4 rebounds while Koach averaged 6.2 points and 4.8 rebounds a game last year.

"It will be tough. Anytime you play on somebody's home court [it's tough]," O'Brien said. "I don't think it's any secret that the SEC is probably the best conference in the country from top to bottom. It's going to be a challenge for us, but it's going to be a good challenge."

Leading the way for the Minutewomen will be juniors Melissa Gurile and Octavia Thomas. In UMass' exhibition game against the Italian National Team last Friday both drew praise from O'Brien. Gurile scored a team high 17 points while Thomas finished with a team high seven rebounds.

UMass will also need big play from sophomores Crystal Carroll and Beth Kuzmeski. Carroll has been hampered by an ankle injury which could affect her getting a

Minutemen head to NCAA's as No. 6

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Just when you think you know all the answers, they change all the questions.

This seemed to get the best of the majority of the UMass fall teams this semester when it came to achieving postseason glory. The daytime robbery of an NCAA bid for the women's field hockey team, the disappointing conclusion for the seniors of the football team, and the fall from grace of cross country star Melissa Langevin in the ECAC Championships are just a few examples.

But this weekend the final opportunity for NCAA victory will arise for the No. 10 nationally ranked University of Massachusetts men's water polo team. The Minutemen will take their school record 30–6 mark and sixth seeding, to the historic Belmont Plaza swimming pool in Long Beach, Ca. in hopes to reach the Final Four.

Their first round match should be to their liking, as they will face a familiar West Coast foe in the Golden Bears of the University of California–Berkeley. What should not be to their liking, though, is the results of the last two meetings of these squads. In the first round of last year's NCAAs, UMass lost by the deceptive margin of 17–4. Earlier this season at the Labor Day Invitational in Annapolis, the Golden Bears also were able to pull away with an even larger victory of 20–3.

But the scores do not tell the true story. Just making the National Championships last season was an accomplishment in itself, and the team appeared to play that way. In their matchup this year, the Minutemen did not have their full squad, and full preparation for a Top 10 team was not readily at hand. UMass Coach Russ Yarworth does not use these as excuses, and he knows the magnitude of the task that lies before them.

"Our approach this year is different. Last year, we were pretty much happy to be there and we played really well. This year, we're happy to be there, but we are focusing and training a lot better," Yarworth said. "We played California the first weekend and they beat us good. We were a lot different because they played all summer and we were just in the water for two weeks. The kids were tired. They are obviously a higher caliber, but I don't think the difference is that profound. I've been telling my guys if they believe they can accomplish something, they can do it. It would be a major upset, but that is what our goal is."

The experience level of the East and West Coast teams were pretty much even according to Yarworth, but the problem is the bench depth and size difference between the two regions. The rise of competition comes at a good time for the Minutemen, as they are once again hitting their peak behind a good week of practices. Yarworth expects the standard offensive burden to be placed on their top scorers, senior co–captain Javier Gonzalez and junior Luis Limardo. However, the key to their game plan will be defense, especially with the performances of juniors Alex Mujica and John Luviano.

"What we have to especially be a lot more aware of is counterattack defense, because the intensity and physical play is one thing, but the speed is another," Yarworth said. "I feel if we can control the transition game, we can play pretty even in the half court. It's going to start with Alex (Mujica), because we got to play defense better than we ever played it. Defense starts with Alex, and then we got to run our drops, zones, and press really well. Beyond that, a total team effort. It's the rest of the guys that play team defense and team counterattack that are really going to make the difference.

"[Luviano] is a guy who I can always rely on to be in the right place. He covers water tremendously well and doesn't get the big stats. But that is not his job right now. His job is to get in the water, swim up and down, play great defense and do what we expect of him. He has a tremendous attitude. He is an unsung hero and an integral part of the team. You got to have those players."

All in all, the team has made a mark for themselves this season. Repeating as Eastern Champions and achieving a second straight NCAA berth, the team will look to take the next step to national prominence, the Final Four.

"This year, there is a lot less of the 'hey, we've done what we wanted to do this season' attitude. Now it's 'hey, we've only done part of what we wanted to do', and see if we can keep that going," Yarworth said.

The Patriots are back and AFC race tightens up

Mike Reiss on the NFL

So there I was in Section 307, leaning up against the press box as I watched my beloved New England Patriots dismantle the San Diego Chargers. It was total domination.

Let's put this in perspective. Last year, the Pats had but one win at this point of the season. What a turnaround. And for all you fairweather fans who jumped off the wagon after the team fell to 3–6, it's nice to have you back on.

And for all the critics who said there was no running game, you can come out of your hiding places next Sunday night when the Pats meet Indianapolis at the Hoosier Dome for a nationally televised game on ESPN. I wouldn't want to be seen around town either. It must be embarrassing.

Moving on to other NFL notes, isn't it clear that if Dallas happens to lose, the team that plays them the following week is going to get clobbered? Washington is this past week's evidence as the Cowboys rolled to a 31–7 win. But that victory could be costly for the Boys.

Troy Aikman and Rodney Peete went down with injuries, leaving the QB duties to Jason Garrett. I've seen this whole act before. Remember? This is the part when Emmitt Smith shows why he is one of the best running backs in the league. Mark my words, he'll have close to 200 yards on the ground Thursday on Turkey Day.

Hey, did you catch the fact that several teams that met up this past Sunday were playing for the first time since some of us were born? Between the Pats–Chargers, Jets–Vikings and Seahawks–Buccaneers matchups, there was some 35 combined years.

Could the Dolphins go into their late season plunge early this year? It sure looks that way, and that only means good things for Pats fans. The AFC East race continues to tighten.

Okay, so maybe I'm the master of the obvious, but how's this for you? The Pats will make the playoffs this year.

I caught a little of the Arizona–Philadelphia game on Sunday and once I saw Buddy Ryan on the Cardinals sideline, I changed the channel. No, I don't particularly like the man. But now that his name has come up in discussion, I want to tip my cap to New England for choosing Bill Parcells as its head coach before last season.

Ryan was rumored to be one of the leading candidates for the job, and looking back, it's clear the Pats made the right choice. And when Parcells, in his biggest personnel move of his tenure, was forced to choose between Drew Bledsoe and Rick Mirer with the first selection in the 1993 NFL draft, another right choice was made.

The above two examples are a main reason why New England is turning into a class franchise — and a winner.

The Bills continue to age, yet continue to win. That's a great story in itself.

I hate the prevent defense. On Sunday, it put San Diego in a chance to win the game, even though the chance was slight. And in the Raiders–Saints game, the Saints scored two late touchdowns to trim the LA lead to five points. When I asked someone in Section 307 what the prevent defense was trying to accomplish, the person snapped back "It prevents us from winning." Well said.

Let's go to the rolodex: John Elway can still perform, is late game magic.

Where has the legacy of great quarterbacks in Pittsburgh gone. Mike Tomczak started for the Steelers Sunday . . . Stealing a line from Chris Berman, Tampa Bay is the only team I know that can snatch defeat from the jaws of victory.

Finally, with my appearance in Foxboro Sunday I certainly do have a lot of tailgating to talk about. First of all, apologies go out to Scotty, who I was unable to meet at the game. Since we were at complete opposite ends of the stadium, and Scotty was too stubborn to come to my spread, the connection wasn't made. But hey, because Scotty continues to heckle me and threaten my family's well–being, I've decided to make another trip into Foxboro Dec. 4 against the Jets. And I'm going in with Scotty to show him what it's all about.

For the time being, Double R remains in the lead for Tailgater of the Year, while Scotty, brother Doogie and myself are in a dead heat for second place. Throw Drummer and Co. in for third place, as they all tailgated before and after the game.

A great scene this Sunday was when the four men next to us asked us to clear a spot off our table for their grill. Of course, we obliged. "Wow, you guys really have it down pat. You're seasoned veteran tailgaters," they said in our direction, staring intently at Double R's apron which read: "50 and over the Grill."

Is there any doubt why the guy is the frontrunner for the award? Can anyone match that? He's 50 and still grilling strong. Finally, he's a tailgating tactical genius. While everyone was stuck in the traffic on Route 1, Double R simply squirted out the backroads. Estimated time of travel from Foxboro to our home: 32 minutes. While many speak of what makes a good tailgate, few mention avoiding the late game rush. It's not just tailgating, but finding the right place to do it.

To all, have a happy Thanksgiving and a great weekend of turkey and tailgating.

Massachusetts blows out No. 1 Arkansas 104–80

Minuetmen outhustle Razorbacks in upset win

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — Prior to the tip-off of the Massachusetts- Arkansas game on Friday night, Razorback guard Corey Beck raised both arms, with his index fingers extended to the sky.

About two hours later, and 40 minutes of game-time played, it was Minuteman forward Lou Roe who had his arms up, and his index fingers high in the air. Roe and the No. 5 ranked Minutemen soundly defeated No. 1 ranked and NCAA defending champion Arkansas 104–80 in the Tip Off Classic at the Springfield Civic Center in front of 8,999 in attendance and an ESPN viewing audience.

With the convincing victory against the supposedly invincible Razorbacks, Massachusetts could very well be the No. 1 team in the country in the Associated Press poll which comes out later today.

What came as a shocker to many was the way Massachusetts dominated practically every facet of the game against the Razorbacks, who posed the best front-court and backcourt in all the preseason polls. And rightfully so, since Arkansas returned all five starters intact from the championship team.

Then again, Massachusetts returned all five, as well, so the hype of the matchup was justified. What it came down to in both team's first game of the season was that stale cliche of who wanted it the most. In the end — and the beginning, as well — it was proven that the aggressive Minutemen were hungry for a win.

"They came to play," said Arkansas coach Nolan Richardson. "Obviously, a very good and aggressive basketball game. They should be commended for their effort, and how hard they worked."

The intensity displayed by the Massachusetts unit was from start to finish, player to player. They were reckless on the boards, chalking up 54 rebounds to Arkansas' 34. The Minutemen scored 69 points in the paint, 30 more than the Razorbacks.

The Minuteman defense was relentless, with Roe holding All-America candidate Corliss Williamson to 15 points and seven boards. Razorback Corey Beck was scoreless and turned the ball over three times against the likes of SPRINGFIELD —It is becoming a reputation.

If the game is an important one then Lou Roe will be in the spotlight. When Massachusetts upset the defending National Champion North Carolina Tar Heels a year ago, Roe scored 28 points. A game many said could not be equalled. They were wrong. The senior co-captain dominated, scoring 34 points and pulling down 13 rebounds as the No. 3 Minutemen upset the No. 1 Arkansas Razorbacks 104–80.

From the opening tip, Roe was in control. He outhustled Razorback guard Clint McDaniel to a loose ball to open the game with a dunk.

The play set the tone for the game, as Roe hustled to every loose ball.

Among those impressed by the performance was Arkansas Coach Nolan Richardson. The 1993–94 National Coach of the Year said that he knew Roe was talented, but he did not know how talented.

"I've always thought Lou is a great player, but tonight he really showed it," Richardson said. "You can only see so much watching a player on TV. He was quicker than I expected. I saw him move without the ball. I saw him attack the basket. I saw him rebound. I saw him make some passes. He did everything a great player should do to help his basketball team. He's a great player."

Roe did not put up those numbers matched up against just anybody. He

Campus funding for defense research decreasing

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Student protests of funding for defense and weapons research at the University of Massachusetts have waned over the years.

In 1989, students held a mock marriage between the University and the Department of Defense on the Student Union Building steps in protest of the defense funding for research at UMass — costumes and all.

Those days of creative protest are over, but there may be less of a need for them anyway because of yearly decreases in defense funding for university research with the end of the cold war.

These annual decreases [in research funding] have carried on into the 1995 budget, and may affect the research done on the UMass campus in the future.

These annual decreases have carried on into the 1995 budget, and may affect the research done on the UMass campus in the future.

It is still too early, however, to determine the exact figures for cuts in federal funding for the University, according to Michael Weinberg, special assistant to the vice chancellor of research.

Last year, UMass received $7,853,000 from the Department of Defense — a decrease from the $10,008,000 the University received for the fiscal year of 1993, Weinberg said.

Figures are expected to drop again this year, as well, Weinberg said.

Nationwide, in 1992, UMass was ranked 98th out of the 100 top schools to receive funding for research and development.

This funding is vested into different defense-related projects around campus. Computer science, electrical and computer engineering and polymer science are the top three departments that receive federal funding for research in these areas.

Other funds are scattered throughout the campus in such departments as molecular and cellular biology, psychology and English, Weinberg said.

The polymer science department has historically used the funds to work on ground-breaking, nationally-recognized projects, according to Bill MacKnight, chair of the polymer science department.

For example, the polymer science department contributed to the development of strong, light-weight materials for aircrafts that are fuel-efficient.

The department also developed other worldwide developments of plastics that conduct energy in the same way that high conducting materials, such as copper, would, MacKnight said.

Federal research funding for the nation will ring in at $1.6 billion next year. This is a $200 million cut from last year's $1.8 billion federal defense budget for research.

This is part of President Clinton's initiative to cut defense spending and apply the remaining funds in the most efficient way possible.

The initiative is aimed at advancing the U.S. economy as well as furthering its technological advancement, according to the Congress' Views and Estimates of the Committee on Science, Space and Technology on the Fiscal Year 1995 Budget.

Serbian rebels' attack starting to take control

By Snjezana Vukic
Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — Rebel Serbs pounded the outskirts of Bihac in northwestern Bosnia Sunday as U.S. and NATO officials admitted they were powerless to stop the advance. U.S. Defense Secretary William Perry even suggested that the Bosnian government had now lost the 31-month war. And the commander of U.N. forces in Bosnia, Gen. Sir Michael Rose, said the 24,000 peacekeepers may withdraw if the military situation continues to deteriorate.

The Bosnian government said it would accept a U.N. proposal for a Bihac cease-fire, demilitarization of the "safe area" and withdrawal of forces, said Michael Williams, spokesman for Yasushi Akashi, the chief U.N. envoy in former Yugoslavia.

Bosnian Serbs have demanded a nationwide cease-fire. Their answer to the U.N. proposal was not immediately known.

Serb fighters from Bosnia and neighboring Croatia now control 30 to 40 percent of the U.N.-designated "safe area" at Bihac, and there was no sign their assault would stop. U.N. officials said shelling and heavy small arms and machine-gun fire rang out southwest and east of Bihac town.

The Serbs were torching most villages they have captured south of Bihac, said a confidential U.N. situation report obtained by The Associated Press.

"The situation is grave and the future of the safe area must be in doubt" if no truce is agreed, the report added.

Later Sunday, a U.N. official in the Bihac pocket, Ed Joseph, told reporters in Zagreb, Croatia by radio that shooting and explosions had died down.

The capture of Bihac would be the strongest indication yet that the United Nations can't stop the war with peacekeeping troops or even NATO airstrikes on the Serbs. Government forces haven't been able to beat the Serbs on the battlefield, and the U.N. Security Council has refused to intervene on the government side.

Bihac Mayor Hamdija Kabiljagic, speaking by radio with Sarajevo, vowed Bihac would never surrender and denied a U.N. report that the government army's 5th Corps blew up its Bihac headquarters and retreated north.

The Serbs have vowed to destroy the 5th Corps, which launched a successful offensive from Bihac last month, only to lose much of the captured territory later.

Elsewhere, Serbs again humiliated the United Nations, apparently taking 102 Dutch and 62 British U.N. soldiers hostage as they transported supplies through eastern and central Bosnia.

The Dutch peacekeepers were en route Saturday to the eastern enclave of Srebrenica. The British were headed for Gorazde, another eastern enclave, and Kiseljak, just west of Sarajevo, said U.N. spokesman Maj. Herve Gourmelon.

They were last heard from in Serb territory, Gourmelon said. The Serbs now have more than 400 peacekeepers under their control since threatening to take hostages in retaliation for NATO airstrikes around Bihac last week.

Some of the 1,200 Bangladeshi peacekeepers in the Bihac region came under sniper fire for six to seven minutes Sunday on a road near Velika Kladusa in the north of the pocket, a U.N. source in Zagreb said.

Near Sarajevo, Canadian peacekeepers reported that Serbs fired as many as 10 rockets at their camp in Visoko early Sunday. No one was injured, said Canadian Maj. Gen. Ray Crabbe.

The Serb advance on Bihac and the growing dangers to the 24,000 peacekeepers may force the United Nations to withdraw them, Rose said.

"If the scene gets much worse militarily, then I suspect the peacekeeping mission would find it very difficult to continue," he said.

The United States is sending 3,600 U.S. sailors and Marines on three ships to the Adriatic. Perry said they were there for a rescue, "if that becomes necessary."

Chanukah, the old traditional Jewish holiday is underway

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

The Jewish holiday of Chanukah began last night at sundown.

The holiday, also called the Festival of Lights, lasts eight days, from sunset to sunrise.

The holiday commemorates a military victory as well as a miracle. In 165 BC, a small group of Jews led by the Maccabees, defeated a much larger Syrian army in a rebellion against Syria.

After the victory, the Jews wished to rededicate the Temple. However, they only found enough to oil to keep the lights lit for one day. Miraculously though, the light remained lit for the eight days until more oil could be obtained.

In memory, candles are lit every night for all eight days of the holiday, while prayers are said. One candle is lit per day plus one extra that is used to light the rest of the candles. In this manner, nine candles are lit total on the eighth and final day.

Children traditionally play dreidle, which is a small top with four Hebrew letters inscribed on its side.

Meeting aims to bring in helping hands

VIVA group hoping to increase UM campus volunteerism

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

In an effort to promote volunteerism and community service at the University of Massachusetts, the Volunteers Involved in Vital Action (VIVA) is holding a brainstorming meeting this week for all interested campus representatives.

The Thursday meeting is intended to bring together campus student organizations in order to discuss ideas for an upcoming rally in March, according to Kristen Moriarty.

Moriarty is coordinator of the Boltwood Project, a Registered Student Organization (RSO) designed to create weekly recreational activities for developmentally disabled people. Student volunteers can receive credits for their work.

"The rally is to promote community service campus wide," Moriarty said. "We want all RSOs and student groups to have community service as part of their organizations."

Moriarty said the rally, scheduled for March 4, is also to congratulate organizations which already have community service as part of their plan. There will be conferences planned in conjunction with the rally.

Conferences earlier in the year, sponsored by VIVA, did not receive the student turn out organizers had hoped for.

To promote more support, a rally will be an addition to the conference format they had last year.

"I don't think [VIVA] got the student turn out they had hoped for," Moriarty said.

The conference in February consisted of four small groups focusing on community service, and keynote speaker Gregory T. Ricks, vice president for Education and Training.

The upcoming meeting will facilitate discussions as to the direction the March event will take.

"That's why this meeting on Thursday is so important," Moriarty said. "Instead of guessing what the students want from the conferences, we're going to ask."

Moriarty said the difference between the two conferences is not only the pre-conference meeting in December. They are now taking a new root with the rally aspect.

"Nothing's set in stone," Moriarty said. "There are a lot of options. We're trying to get a keynote speaker, and we believe it will be in the Student Union ballroom."

Moriarty said there also might be a "thermometer" showing a combined total of hours each RSO and student organization has committed towards community service.

"We don't want it to become a competition thing," Moriarty said. "If you put in two or three hours, the whole point is to show together how much we can do."

The rally is also important because it will bring light to VIVA, Moriarty said.

"A lot of students want to get involved in community services," Moriarty said. "They don't know there's a whole office for that."

Moriarty said VIVA currently doesn't know how many students will be at the Dec. 1 meeting at the Newman Center, but said she hopes there is a large turnout.

For more information about the meeting, or if you have any questions, contact Lori McKinney from VIVA at 545-3568.

Dollar Gains Strength From Stock Market

NEW YORK (AP) — The dollar was mixed and little changed against other key currencies, compared with late European levels, in quiet post-holiday trading Friday, drawing some strength from a rebound in U.S. stock prices.

The Dow Jones industrial average of big-company stocks rose more than 33 points, partly recovering from the week's sell-off.

"Currency traders were looking closely at the stock markets with the falloff over the last few days," said Matt Porio, a vice president at Chase Manhattan Bank. "But there was no cause for alarm today."

Stocks Make Gains In Slow Trading Day

NEW YORK (AP) —Stocks rallied Friday in subdued post-holiday trading, as investors took a break from selling inspired by fears that higher interest rates will hurt the economy.

The session, which ended at 1 p.m., was a surprisingly strong about-face from the dramatic selling that sent the Dow Jones average plummeting 91 points on Tuesday.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 33.64 points Friday to 3,708.27.

Analysts said the rally was tied to a dearth of participants in the market, as many traders took the day after Thanksgiving off. Buyers outnumbered sellers, sending prices higher. But analysts warned that the day's activity did not indicate a major change in heart on the part of investors.

Commitments to Crops Helps Trade Make Gains

CHICAGO (AP)— Soybeans futures prices advanced Friday in a shortened session on the Chicago Board of Trade amid continued strength in the soybean oil market.

World vegetable oil prices have rallied in recent weeks on tight supplies of Malaysian palm oil and increased Chinese demand. A weekly export sales report released Thursday showed commitments were running double the year-ago level. The report also showed made significant purchases, said Dan Cekander, a grains analyst with Rodman & Renshaw Inc. in Chicago.

Corn futures prices settled higher, also boosted by the export sales report. Wheat futures prices ended mixed.

Wheat futures for December delivery settled 1 1/4 cents higher at $3.65 1/2 a bushel, December corn rose 1/2 cent to $2.12 1/4 a bushel; December oats rose 1 1/4 cents to $1.13 1/4 a bushel; January soybeans rose 2 3/4 cents to $5.68 a bushel; and December soybean oil rose 0.38 cent to 28.72 cents a bushel.

Illegal immigrants blamed for societal problems

By Sally Streff Buzbee
Associated Press

NOGALES, Ariz. — From hard-scrabble, little towns along Rio Grande borderland to bustling cities in desert mountains, Americans along the Mexican border are eyeing California's tough new anti-immigration law with envy.

Some observers had dismissed the popularity of Proposition 187 in California as mostly reflective of that state's particular problems: a sagging economy, overburdened schools, overflowing hospital emergency rooms.

But an Associated Press reporter who drove from Texas through New Mexico and Arizona the week after Californians approved the new law found plenty of non-Californians ready to blame illegal immigrants for their assorted ills.

Liberal or conservative, well off or poor, regardless of whether they are white, black or Hispanic, residents resent their tax dollars being spent on "the wrong people," providing welfare, food stamps and other support to those they say don't belong here.

"Too many people are coming," Marta Cadena says in her native Spanish from behind the counter of her clothing shop in Eabens, Texas, pop. 5,200, a few miles south of El Paso.

"Too many are on welfare." Her sentiment was not universal. Others living along the 2,000-mile border fear a crackdown on illegals can only harden attitudes toward people with brown skin. Others fret that the Mexican customers they depend upon will boycott U.S. businesses.

So far, no state has formally proposed following California's lead, but Proposition 187 advocates say they've had feelers from states along the Mexican border and from Florida. More importantly, the anti-immigrant movement seems headed for Congress.

California Gov. Pete Wilson has suggested Congress adopt a federal version of Prop 187, and such key Republicans as U.S. Rep. Lamar Smith of Texas and Sen. Alan Simpson of Wyoming say they will include many of the California ideas in sweeping reform measures they'll introduce in January. Still, Republicans are deeply divided over how far reform should go. William Bennett criticized Wilson last week for "scapegoating" immigrants, and Jack Kemp said strengthening the Border Patrol was a better idea than banning kids from school. Both former Cabinet secretaries are potential GOP presidential candidates for 1996.

Even supporters of a strong law, like Mrs. Cadena, often have deeply conflicting feelings, regarding the porous border as both economic opportunity and threat.

In rundown little Eabens, the Hispanic women who buy Mrs. Cadena's silk shirts embroidered with gold come from "dos lados" - both sides. Mrs. Cadenas' family comes from both sides, too. She was born 40 years ago in Juarez, just across the river, but she's lived in the United States 20 years, the last two as an American citizen. She speaks only Spanish, although she's taken several stabs at English lessons at the behest of her husband, Reynaldo, who is from Texas.

As she talks about Proposition 187, Mrs. Cadena flips casually between support and concern. She finds parts of the law mean-spirited, for instance. "Don't keep the children from school," she says. "That's not right."

GLB Speaker's Bureau wants people to tell their stories

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

Whether you are part of a local group trying to educate its members on gay, lesbian, and bisexual issues or a GLBT person seeking to share your experiences with the local community, the UMass Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Speaker's Bureau wants you to know that they are around and need your help.

The UMass GLB Speaker's Bureau is a program founded nearly a decade ago to educate the local community about gay, lesbian, and bisexual people. The Bureau is made up of a group of volunteers — GLBT and heterosexual allies — who travel around the area sharing their individual experiences.

"I want to do what I can to educate as many people as I can," said John Beck, a junior English major who has been a Bureau member for several years.

Some people who attend Speaker's Bureaus have never been introduced to an openly gay, lesbian, or bisexual person, says Beck. By allowing such individuals to listen to his story as a gay man, Beck hopes to open people's minds and eradicate some of the stereotypes that still persist.

Sharing with the community

The Bureau addresses audiences in a variety of settings. Although most of its engagements are on-campus — in dorms, in classrooms, at various UMass agencies — the Bureau also speaks at the request of local church groups, schools, and social organizations. On average the Bureau does 25 to 30 engagements per semester.

In a typical Speaker's Bureau, a panel of three or four Bureau members appears before a group. Each member tells a personal story about his or her experience as a gay man, lesbian, bisexual, or heterosexual ally.

"I feel like sharing personal stories is a very powerful educational tool," said Bureau member Libby Woodfin, a student at Hampshire College.

Members address a wide variety of issues in their stories, from how they realized their sexual orientation to experiences with their families to current relationships.

One of the current Bureau members, Cathy Sherry, a UMass staff employee, says that sharing the story of her long-term relationship is important to her. Many people think that lesbians are never involved in long term relationships, she said. When Sherry tells them of her current relationship, which has gone on for a decade, she finds that a lot of people change their minds about lesbian relationships.

Answering questions

After the stories, members move on to a question and answer session. People in the audience can ask questions about what the speakers have said or about gay, lesbian, and bisexual people in general.

"The questions are usually pretty tame, pretty safe," Beck said.

Sometimes, however, people do come up with some interesting questions. Often the most questions come up when GLB speakers bring up their children. Most speakers agree that the issue of GLB people having children is something that really interests the population at large.

When answering questions, speakers try to answer based solely on their own experiences. They do not pretend to speak for all GLB people or all heterosexual allies. They stress that they can only speak for themselves.

After the question and answer session is over, the Bureau comes to an end, but according to some speakers, it is just the beginning. Often people come up to the speakers and ask questions they are too embarrassed or afraid to ask in front of a larger group. Sometimes people just want to thank the speakers for sharing their stories.

Working towards more diversity

One of the current goals of the Speaker's Bureau is building a more diverse membership said Ken Kirkey, Bureau coordinator for the Program for GLB Concerns. Currently the Bureau has around 25 members, but, says Kirkey, none of them are African-American and few of them are members of minority groups.

When people in a Bureau audience are closeted gays, lesbians, or bisexuals, they are often looking for role models. If they are Black or members of some other minority groups, however, audience members may not be able to find someone they can identify with.

The same goes for heterosexual audience members. A Black person who has never met a Black gay, lesbian or bisexual might look at the Bureau and think that they don't exist. The Bureau is looking to change that situation, said Kirkey.

To contact the Speaker's Bureau

To engage a Speaker's Bureau, call 545-2632 and fill out an engagement form using just your voice and a touch-tone telephone. Those who would like to learn more about the Bureau or volunteer as speakers should call the Program for GLB Concerns at 545-4824.

Minutemen crush No. 1 Arkansas

guards Derek Kellogg and Edgar Padilla.

"I really didn't get into the game as well as I should have been," Williamson said. "I had a lack of intensity, and I felt I didn't perform the way I'm capable of performing."

The swarming defense controlled the normally explosive Arkansas offense, who led once in the game 14-2 early in the game. As for the loose balls, the majority of them went to the hustling Massachusetts unit.

The Minutemen were not lacking in the effort category, to say the least.

"I'm very proud of our basketball team right now," said Coach John Calipari. "The way they responded to this kind of environment, the hype that went along with this game. They showed no fear. My biggest worry was if were we getting away from what made us good, UMass basketball — a swarming defense, a relentless rebounding team, a team that has fun on the floor, a team that plays unselfish basketball, and makes the extra pass.

"I think if you saw tonight, we haven't gotten away from what's made us good."

Roe had arguably the best game of his career against arguably the best player he has faced in Williamson. The tired-up senior forward scored a career-high 34 points and pulled down 13 rebounds, after starting the game with a dunk off the tip. Donta Bright also had a huge game, slashing his way for 24 points and eight boards.

"I think Donta Bright was the difference in us being on the floor with them, and us beating them," Calipari said.

Marcus Camby, despite getting himself into early foul trouble, scored 13 points and had 12 rebounds. Dana Dingle was the other Minuteman in double-figures with 10.

Scotty Thurman led the Razorbacks with 17 points, including three three pointers. Clint McDaniel scored 16 and Alex Dillard had 11.

The Razorbacks held their own in the beginning, as a Williamson dunk narrowed the Massachusetts lead to two, 21-19 with 13:00 left in the half. After Camby hit 1 of 2 free throws, Bright sank three unanswered jumpers on the next three trips, and hit a free throw for a three-point play on the last one, building the Minuteman lead to 10, 29-19.

With 3:34 left in the first half, Massachusetts stretched the lead to 19 on a made Roe free throw. Arkansas then hit two consecutive three-pointers, compliments of Thurman and Dillard, respectively, to decrease the lead to 13. Minuteman reserve Carmelo Travieso answered with a trey of his own, halting a possible Razorback rally.

The first half began with the Roe dunk in the opening seconds, and ended with a Roe lay-in as he rebounded a Bright miss and converted with just one second remaining on the clock.

The final 20 minutes of the game for Massachusetts was spent keeping the lead on the sluggish Razorbacks. A Darnell Robinson lay-in opened up the second half to decrease the lead to 14, only to have the Minutemen go on a 16-2 run. A Bright pull-up jumper with 12:36 left in regulation culminated a game-high 28-point lead, 68-40.

PAUL BEDOEAU / COLLEGIAN

Senior point guard Derek Kellogg kept Arkansas' Corey Beck scoreless as the Massachusetts co-captain helped lead the Minutemen to a 104-80 rout in his hometown of Springfield.

The last eight minutes of the game went back and forth. The Razorbacks got as close as 13, but the pumped-up Minutemen were too much to handle.

Free throws played a gigantic part in the game as the Minutemen knocked down 40-50 from the charity stripe. Roe and Bright went a combined 20-22. Another one of the keys to the Massachusetts victory was the use of eleven players in its lineup. With the shuffling being done, the Minutemen were able to stay fresh, and utilize their quickness.

"Today, we were the better team. Today. Today," Calipari said. "The season is long, we're using [the Arkansas win] to learn about our team. I learned some good things and some bad things."

Roe gets best of rival Williamson was being guarded by Corliss Williamson, an All-American and a preseason favorite for the National Player of the Year. Meeting the game, many observers wondered if Roe would be able to keep up with the much-hyped Williamson.

After the game most doubters were convinced. Roe dominated the game as the "Big Nasty," as Williamson has been dubbed, became a big nonfactor, scoring a quiet 13 points with a mere seven rebounds. Not only did Roe outscore and outplay Williamson, but Roe's points and boards were better than the combined efforts of Williamson and fellow Razorback stars Scotty Thurman and Corey Beck.

"Corliss was a big challenge for me," Roe said. "I wanted to prove that I was one of the best players in the country also."

Williamson who has played against some impressive competition in his two previous seasons, including former Kentucky forward and current Dallas Maverick Jamal Mashburn, puts Roe on par with anyone he's played against.

"Right now I'd put him at the top," Williamson said. "Lou just had a helluva game. What more can you say."

While Williamson might have had nothing else to say about Roe's performance, what Williamson said in preseason about UMass was part of what inspired Lou's performance.

"He put fuel in the fire, with his quote saying that [Arkansas'] second team is better than our first team," Roe said. "That pissed me off a little bit. We were ranked No. 3 in the nation and we wanted to live up to that standard."

Calipari has come to expect these type of performances from Roe.

"I know Lou Roe would play the way he did. I won't trade him for anybody. He's my guy. He's been my guy for four years. What we wanted to do was post the ball, because we didn't think they could guard Roe." said Calipari, who despite Roe's impressive numbers expects even more in the future. "Lou Roe can shoot the ball. He can shoot threes. He can come down on the drive and pull up, but he didn't have to today. He is playing to his strengths. He is so much better than he's been."

Roe pledged that the performance would not make him complacent.

"I'm going to enjoy tonight, and then I'm going to put it behind me," he said. "We've got Kansas next."

Following the game Roe went immediatly to ESPN analyst Dick Vitale, who had picked the Razorbacks as his No. 1 team in the nation.

"Who's No. 1 now Dicky V?" Roe said.

The Associated Press will release its latest poll later on today, in which the Minutemen could receive their first ever No. 1 ranking.

Shooting at car claims the life of rabbi

By Gwen Ackerman
Associated Press

BEIT HAGAI, West Bank — A rabbi was shot to death and an Israeli policeman wounded in a hail of bullets fired at their car Sunday as they drove toward a Jewish settlement. Islamic militants claimed responsibility.

The shooting, on the eve of the Jewish holiday of Hanukkah, occurred 3 miles from Hebron, where tensions have been high since the massacre of 29 Muslim worshipers by a Jewish settler at a mosque Feb. 25.

It came a day before Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres was to meet with PLO leader Yasser Arafat in Brussels, Belgium, and as the exile of violence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip is pushing negotiators to speed up the peace process.

Jewish settlers blamed government peace policies for encouraging Islamic militants, but members of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's Cabinet pledged to continue talks with the PLO.

"We must continue the peace process and do our best so that such sad events will not occur in the future," said Immigration Minister Yair Tsaban.

An anonymous caller claiming to be from the radical Muslim group Hamas called Israel radio and claimed responsibility for Sunday's shooting. Hamas had carried out a suicide bombing that killed 23 people in Tel Aviv last month.

"We will continue the attacks," he said. The man said the shooting marked the anniversary of the killing of a Hamas activist by Israeli forces last year.

Israeli sources said the gunfire came from a passing car carrying at least two men. The rabbi's car drove off the road and flipped over.

Blood stained the muddy ground and seeped from cracks in the front windshield. Six bullet holes pierced windows, and 30 shell casings from an automatic rifle littered the ground.

The victim was Rabbi Ami Olami, 35, the spiritual leader of Otniel, a nearby settlement with about 50 families. He was heading back to Otniel from another Jewish settlement.

A policeman riding with him was shot in the back of the head, but managed to get out of the car and fire at the attackers, settlers said. He was hospitalized in fair condition.

Seminary students at the scene were led away sobbing. One recited prayers as the rabbi's body lay under a gray blanket nearby.

"May God avenge his blood," Moshe Rabinovich of the Beit Hagai settlement said as he stood next to an ambulance.

Noam Arnon, a spokesman for the Jewish settlement in the nearby city of Hebron, blamed Rabin's peace accord for the attack.

"They are responsible and will be responsible for every dead victim and all that is going on here," Arnon said. "They will not get away with it. The people will find justice."

The West Bank Settler's Council, which speaks for many of the 120,000 settlers, said the attack was encouraged by government promises to expand autonomy in the West Bank and withdraw troops. Palestinians now control the Gaza Strip and Jericho in the West Bank.

Israel radio said Lt. Gen. Ehud Barak, the army chief of staff, told the Cabinet that more terrorist attacks could be expected. At their meeting Monday, Peres and Arafat are expected to discuss problems facing the expansion of autonomy.

Before leaving for Brussels, Peres indicated the two sides could speed up the timetable for reaching agreement on the final status of the occupied lands. "We have to try to imagine and create some new solutions," he said.

Israeli officials floated the idea of a three-day Israeli troop withdrawal in West Bank cities so Palestinian elections initially planned for last July could be held. However, Rabin told the Cabinet that the idea had been rejected.

An Israeli official who demanded anonymity said Rabin's government may now propose skipping over elections and going to the next phase - discussing the final status of Jerusalem and the West Bank. Such talks were not scheduled to start until 1996.

The official said the government believed withdrawing troops from Arab towns posed too great a threat to the 144 Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

Instead, Rabin aides were considering consolidating some of the West Bank settlements and speeding up the transfer of administrative powers to the PLO, the official said.

Arafat and Peres are also expected to coordinate positions before meeting with donor nations to ensure that $6.00 million in aid promised to Arafat this year will start flowing.

Each of the letters tell players what to do in a game that involves trading chocolate coins, called gelt. Also, potato pancakes, called latkes, are eaten.

A new tradition has also arisen that one present is exchanged every night. This tradition has arrived mostly due to Chanukah's proximity to Christmas, wherein children receive many presents.

The proximity to Christmas has also made Chanukah seem to be a major holiday, although it is much less important than other holidays such as Rosh Hashana, Yom Kippur, and Passover.

The University of Massachusetts Hillel will be lighting a menorah outside of the Hillel House every night at 5 p.m. except for Friday when it will be lit at 4 p.m. and Saturday when it will be lit at 8 p.m.

Veruca Salt prove they rock; Clerks soundtrack a no sale

AMERICAN THIGHS
Veruca Salt
Minty Fresh Records

Veruca Salt's debut effort, American Thighs

Don't let the look nor the record label fool you. Veruca Salt are about as "alternative" as AC/DC (a band that they obviously copped their album title, as well as more than a few riffs from), and about as exciting as watching the grass grow.

And guess what? They probably put out one of the better rock records this year. Surprised? There is no need to be. Sure, Veruca Salt are nothing more than an arena rock band thinly disguised as indie-rockers right down to the scuffed Doc Marten's on their feet.

But never fear, the folks in Veruca Salt know that a great hook and catchy chorus go along way towards rock n' roll fame (just look at Led Zepplin).

Along with their partners in crime Weezer, Veruca Salt are a new breed of corporate rockers (move over Stone Temple Pilots) which exploit the whole punk/pop genre that has been taking the alternative-world by storm since grunge went the way of Candlebox.

With their crunchy guitar riffs, slick female harmonies, and ironic song topics (such as having sex with Spiderman, or the joys of window blinds), Veruca Salt come off sounding little more than a second rate Breeders.

But listen again and you will hear that beneath all the alterna-girl posturing is a tried and true rock band screaming to get out.

While bands such as the Breeders and Belly want to take you on a sonic head trip, Veruca Salt seem to be more content with just kicking your butt.

Tracks such as the MTV Buzz Clip "Seether" and the infectiously catchy "Forsythia" prove that the band has the chops and the songwriting ability to hold their own.

No, there is nothing profound or moving (no Smashing Pumpkins' "I used to be a little boy" moping here) on American Thighs, but there is still something refreshing in hearing vocalists Nina Gordon and Louise Post letting out a great big "uuhh" before kicking into a riff that would make the guys in Kiss blush.

It is only when Veruca Salt moves away from their upbeat rock numbers that the album begins to drag. To often throughout American Thighs the band slows its sound down to a slow crawl, obviously looking to set a "mood," but often just sounds dull and uninspired.

Trax On Trax Off

Songs such as "Spiderman '79," despite its pleasant backing harmonies, drones along for what seems as though it were an eternity. While vocalist/guitarist Nina Gordon's shrieking on the opening track "Get Back" makes her sound as though she was trying out for a Sinead O' Connor sound- alike contest.

Granted the band is a A&R man's wet dream. Granted indie-purists will pinch their snooty noses and gag. Granted MTV will probably raise them to an unworthy rock godhead status by the end of the year. But when you get right down to it, in an age when bands such as Counting Crows and The Gin Blossoms dominate the charts, Veruca Salt's unabashed rock anthems go down sweet— bad aftertaste and all. B+

CLERKS / SOUNDTRACK
Various Artists
Chaos/Sony Record

Clerks is another slacker, Generation X (and all those other spurious media terms) movie. In the post-Singles tradition, the soundtrack purports to epitomize the sounds and sensibilities of this genre and generation, filled as it is with "alternative" bands- ironically mostly on corporate monolith Sony.

Unfortunately, the idea of the soundtrack as a selling point for this film is some what undermined by the fact that his is the most dreadfully underachieving compilation you will likely ever hear.

This perfectly represents all that is wrong with the "alternative" scene today: "alternative" has become a paradigm for "mediocre."

The best known bands on this compilation are The Jesus Lizard, relying as ever on loud guitars and David Yow's screaming; Soul Asylum, whose anonymous contribution only adds to the feeling that there is no explanation for their presence here when Dave Pirner's paramour Winona Ryder is not in this particular generation Zzzz film; and Alice In Chains, who to be fair, offer by far the best song, "Got Me Wrong," but which is already on one of their own LP's.

Every other track is exclusive, but only leaves you thankful that you don't have to listen to each band's full albums.

And my god, how many more "ironic" '70's stadium rock covers by "alternative" bands do we have to endure? The once promising Soawod offer a grunge-lite version of Fleetwood Mac's "Go Your Own Way," which prompts the shocking revelation- that the song and the band (Fleetwood bloody Mac!) must have had more talent and ambition than all these bands here put together, because in the context of this soundtrack "Go Your Own Way" sounds like a work of sonic genius.

Supernova's "Chewbacca" is the most inept piece of crap you will likely ever experience, relying utterly on this generation's obsession with the Star Wars trilogy of their nostalgic youth.

And here lies the problem with a film about clerks and with these bands- wouldn't you rather have films as exciting and imaginative as Star Wars, or pop stars who really do seem like stars?

The excerpts from the film fall absolutely flat- Pulp Fiction dialogue this ain't. The film itself is allegedly quite good, so maybe I'm being unfair, but this soundtrack certainly does it no favors. The sound and voice of a generation indeed- Generation I. F (Martyn Bone)

Green Day brings punk rock to Mullins

If 1994 will remembered for anything, it will be looked back on as the year that punk rock rose from the depths and stuck its snarling face into the mainstream media.

Leading this green-haired revolution are Berkeley, California malcontents Green Day, who have single-handedly turned the music world upside-down with their hyper- energetic brand of no nonsense pop/punk.

Tonight the Valley can finally get a taste of what all the fuss is about when the trio brings their tunes as well as snot- nosed attitude to the Mullins Center.

Currently riding a wave of controversy that stems from a mud-slinging battle at the much ballyhooed Woodstock '94, and then following it up with a full-fledged riot during a Boston show, Green Day are living testament to the 'Punk rock' life through and through.

Formed in 1987 by singer/guitarist and unlikely pin-up boy Billie Joe and bassist Mike Dirnt, the band began playing parties and earning themselves a reputation as an exciting and unpredictable live act.

The band soon landed a record deal with the Bay Area indie-label Lookout Records, and in 1989 released their debut album 39/Smooth which solidified their penchant for no-frills punk and catchy vocal harmonies.

After touring the U.S. in support of the record the band returned to the studio record their follow-up Kerplunk. Released in 1992, the record featured new drummer Tre Cool whose flamboyant style and stage presence added to their "anything goes" philosophy. The album quickly became Lookout's best selling album and opened a wider audience for the band.

By the time 1993 rolled around Green Day was playing packed houses and receiving heaps of critical acclaim. It was clear that the band had indeed out grown Lookout Record's small atmosphere. Parting with the label on friendly terms, the band went out looking to bring their punk stylings to the majors and soon landed a deal at Warner Bros.

Keeping their underground attitude fully intact, the band recorded their major-label debut Dookie which surprisingly, thanks to the mega-hit single "Longview," has become one of 1994's biggest selling albums. Brimming with the band's trademark attitude and fierce guitar hooks, Dookie managed to sum up white suburban frustration by addressing such problems as bore dom and failed relationships.

Obviously striking the right chord in the post-Nirvana '90s, Green Day quickly were catapulted from underground heroes to MTV poster boys in a matter of months, making them one of today's most sought after bands. Now with the ushering in of a new music revolution which includes bands such as The Offspring, Bad Religion and The Rollins Band, Green Day seem prime candidates to claim the new gold and shiny punk rock throne.

Green Day will play the Mullins Center tonight at 7:30 p.m. Tickets are $15.50. For more information call the Mullins Center Box Office

Eagles return with Hell Freezes Over

HELL FREEZES OVER
The Eagles
Geffen Records

They never broke up, they just took a 14-year vacation according to the Eagles, and that is exactly what it sounded like on their newly released album.

Hell Freezes Over, so named because after publicly feuding the Eagles said that was when they would get back together, is the first album released in more than a decade.

1979 was the last time they released a studio album. The Long Run, although two greatest hits albums were released in the early 80s. The album mixes classic Eagles hits, some solo work, and four new songs, which were done in the studio.

The Eagles oldies, chosen from ones played on the tour, include many of their hits as well as some lesser known songs from their Hotel California album.

The songs were done in true Eagles fashion, sounding like the group had never split up.

The Eagles were not as successful on the newer stuff that was put on the album. While fans were happy to see the new material, it did not live up to their previous standards.

The songs sounded as if the band members were still trying to merge their various styles back together, but were amused to collaborating after their solo work. It did not help that all of the newer songs were placed at the start of the album, instead of being interspersed with the rest of the songs.

Also, the first single released, "Get Over It," hit a sour note, being the worst song on the album, new or old. It sounded as if the Eagles were attempting to play a pop song today, instead of their own style, which was so unique that it was dubbed "California Rock." It was almost as though the Eagles were unsure they would have a following upon their return so wrote this to attract new "Generation X" fans, before returning to their roots. The rest of the new material was much closer to the older, and superior songs played in the band's heyday.

After the five new offerings, however, founding members Don Henley and Glenn Frey, again joined with compatriots Don Felder, Timothy B. Schmit and Joe Walsh, pulled out their old classics.

They played such greats as "Hotel California," "Tequila Sunrise" and "Life in the Fast Lane," as well as their first hit, "Take It Easy." They also played Henley's "New York Minute."

When the final strains of "Desperado" fade after more than an hour of music, the listener is left with fond memories of some of the classic hits of the Eagles, while the new material is already forgotten. B-

PBS documentary showcases physically challenged comedians and their struggles

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES— Don't stare, your parents would murmur as you passed a handicapped person. Don't giggle.

"Look Who's Laughing," a new PBS film about six comedians who are disabled, challenges us to do both. And then defies us to keep our prejudices about the talented men and women we're laughing with, not at.

Get over an initial twinge of discomfort and you find the comics of "Laughing" (airing tonight; check local listings) are simply very funny.

"The weirdest story I read this year was about a 2-year-old girl with cerebral palsy who was never supposed to walk," says Chris Fonseca. "And then she listened to that song 'Achy Breaky Heart,' got up, walked over and turned off the radio."

Here's another Fonseca bit: "My wedding vows should have been a little different. 'You have the right to remain silent. Anything you say can and will be used against you ... over and over and over again.'"

Fonseca's cerebral palsy affects his motor skills and speech, but his impish charm and wit emerge unfettered. We also meet Kathy Buckley, Brett Leake, Alex Valdez, J.D. England and Geri Jewell through offstage interviews and onstage routines.

They joke freely, and smartly, about themselves. "My hearing impairment is not my handicap," says Buckley. "Being sexually frustrated, now there's a handicap. I haven't had a date in 3 1/2 years, and I don't know if it's because I haven't heard the phone ring, or what."

Leake, who has appeared several times on "The Tonight Show," blithely explains away his muscular dystrophy in his act. "People want to know what happened to me. I tell 'em I broke a chain letter," he says.

Sometimes the goal is to inform audiences or put them at ease. Sometimes it's more ambitious.

"I do believe that I have a responsibility to educate," said Jewell, who has cerebral palsy. "I'm not going to go out and tell jokes just to get a laugh."

Buckley shares that attitude. And, with Leake, she shares the distinction of a "Tonight Show" appearance. That is what made "Look Who's Laughing" possible, says the program's executive producer and creator, R.J. Johnson.

Because "Tonight" host Jay Leno was bold enough to feature Leake and Buckley, "they got exposure and I got credibility" for the film.

That translated into $100,000 in funding from the Corporation for Public Broadcasting after every commercial TV network rejected the proposal, Johnson noted.

Other contributors included actor Dustin Hoffman and a foundation established by U.S. Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., who himself is disabled from a war injury to his hand.

> "When you're deaf, your eyes are everything...and the one thing that pleases my eyes more than anything is a smile on someone's face."
> —Kathy Buckley

Johnson said he had to convince his backers "that I could produce a watch able show about disability that wouldn't be preachy."

"I believe it's (comedian) Victor Borge who said the shortest distance between two people is a sense of humor," he said. "If you can laugh with someone about your differences, how can you harbor a prejudice against that person?"

The comics were filmed in various clubs, including Wit's End in Denver, Colo., Screwballs in Fresno and at Los Angeles area nightspots such as the Improv and Laugh Factory.

Johnson and producer Ginger Myers edited 35 hours of interviews and jokes into an hour for the special.

There is no narration, notes Johnson: "I didn't want the voice of what would be perceived as an able-bodied person guiding you through the disabled experience."

Instead, we get the humor and the hearts of the six comedians.

"When you're deaf, your eyes are everything," Buckley says in the film. "And the one thing that pleases my eyes more than anything is a smile on someone's face. So I will do anything to plant it on that face. So that's my gift to myself, to watch them smile."

The handsome, shaggy haired England, who uses a wheelchair, explains his passion for comedy.

"Laughter's great. When I'm laughing and cutting up and having fun, people around me can forget about this thing," England says, gently patting his chair, "and they can just treat me like a normal person. If I've got people laughing, I've got 'em on my side."

Letters to the Editor

To the editor:

Your article of Monday November 21, Thirteen Martyrs — clearly demonstrated the Collegian is badly in need of experienced editors. This sort of heavy-handed polemic on behalf of the conspiracy-theorists among the Palestinian activists in the Valley would never be condoned among professionals.

The anonymous authors showed a lack of judgement by blaming the Israeli government for the massacre of Palestinians in Gaza by the Palestinian Police Force. Prime Minister Rabin correctly called the massacre "An internal Palestinian matter." In response to a demonstration by Palestinians opposed to the Israeli-Palestinian Agreement, the Palestinian Authorities used a similar technique to disperse the crowd as might have been used in Syria or Saudi Arabia. They opened fire.

In all of the intifada, not once did an IDF soldier switch his rifle to full automatic and spray the crowd. It takes a lot of training, and a lot of discipline, to hold yourself back when confronted with a screaming, rock-throwing mob, why should anybody be surprised when a terro-rigged "Palestinian Police" force didn't have that restraint, and when for the first time were confronted with a screaming, rock-throwing mob, lost control of themselves?

There is no evidence to suggest that the Israelis engineered this massacre hoping that it might lead to a Palestinian civil war. The Palestinians now clearly see the result of declaring a convicted murderer and terrorist as their spokesman.

Unfortunately, their selection of Arafat also forced Rabin's hand. The PLO has long claimed to be the voice of the Palestinian People without its agreement from the Palestinians Rabin had no choice but to negotiate with the Chairman of this organization if he wished to achieve peace.

As we see from the riots in Gaza, the Palestinian People have lost confidence in their leadership and are returning to their all or nothing stance. They forget that the result of "all or nothing" is — nothing. The response of the Palestinian Police demonstrated the past restraint of the Israeli Defense Force. The refusal of Arafat to condemn the action of his police force shows his contempt for his constituency.

While I realize that Juan Jose Chacon Quiros has complete control over his section of the paper, the senior editors cannot deny their responsibility for this article. The Collegian's editors decision to print the unsubstantiated accusation of The Coalition for the Defense of Palestine displayed their low estimation of the intelligence of the readers. If they wish to correct their mistake, they should print a retraction and apologize. To prevent future mistakes, in the retraction they should declare their intention to change editorial policy.

I am especially disappointed with the inclusion of the accompanying picture of Jesus the Palestinian. It attests to the sensationalist journalism of the article and could not have been sanctioned by any Christian.

Player of the Game

Lou Roe
6-foot-7
Senior Forward

Starting with his dunk to open the game Roe played won of his best games of his career. The 6—foot—7 senior co— captain set the tone for UMass, battling for every rebound and hustling for every loose ball. His 34 points and 13 rebounds were more than the combined efforts of Arkansas three top players Corliss Williamson, Scotty Thurman and Corey Beck.

Why Massachusetts won:

The Minutemen won on defense, rebounding and desire.

From the opening tip—off the UMass controlled the game, opening up a lead as large as 28 points. The Minutemen outrebounded the Razorbacks 54—34, and outhusted the favorites to loose balls.

Key Matchups:

Roe veraus Williamson. This matchup was billed as a matchup two of the nation's top power forwards and National Player of the Year candidates. Roe was a clear victor in this battle outscoring Williamson 34 to 15, and outrebounding him 13 to 7. Following the game Williamson said that Roe was at the top of the list of players he had played against.

Massachusetts' next game:

The Minutemen will take on No. 11 Kansas next Saturday at the Pond in Anaheim, CA in the first ever John Wooden Classic.

Razorbacks decimate Hoyas

Associated Press

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — The defending national champions are alive and well.

Less than 48 hours after opening the season with a 24-point loss, top-ranked Arkansas looked like the team that won it all last year. The Razorbacks beat No. 14 Georgetown 97-79 Sunday in the inaugural Martin Luther King Classic.

The Razorbacks (1-1) were the first national champion to return five starters since UCLA in 1967. But that wasn't evident in their performance in a 104-80 loss Friday night to No. 3 Massachusetts. As badly as they were beaten by the Minutemen, they beat the Hoyas (0-1). At halftime it was 54-39, and the lead was 95-63 with 6:15 to play. Arkansas controlled the boards and forced turnovers by the bunch just like last season, when the Razorbacks went 31-3 to win their first national title.

Corliss Williamson, who appeared out of synch against Massachusetts, looked like the player who was MVP of the Final Four. He finished with 22 points and 16 rebounds.

Scotty Thurman and Clint McDaniel had 16 points each for Arkansas, while Reggie Garrett added 15.

The game was the debut of Georgetown freshman Allen Iverson, who averaged 37.5 points in the Hoyas' two exhibition games, but struggled against Arkansas defense. He finished with 19 points and George Butler added 17 for the Hoyas.

In the loss to Massachusetts, the Razorbacks were never able to make one of their vaunted runs. It took 10 minutes, but they came up with a vintage one to break open the game against the Hoyas. Georgetown led 17-15 when Garrett keyed a 15-3 run that made it 30-20 with 8:51 left in the first half. Garrett, a transfer from the University of New Orleans, hit two jumpers and a drive during the run as Georgetown missed five shots and turned over the ball twice.

Arkansas avoided losing its first two games of the season since 1973-74 at Louisville was the last defending national champion to lose more than one at the start of the next season. In both 1981 and 1987 the Cardinals opened 0-2 the season after winning it all. Georgetown's last loss was to Arkansas, 83-73 in the second round of last year's NCAA tournament

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. — It was like the postseason in November. Jerry Stackhouse scored a career-high 28 points and made several key plays down the stretch Saturday as No. 2 North Carolina escaped with a 96-92 victory over Texas in the kind of rapid-paced, tension-filled game usually seen in March.

"For the first game of the season it was played like an NCAA tournament game," said Texas coach Tom Penders. "...The effort by both teams - kids were living all over the floor and fighting for loose balls and diving on both sides - it was great basketball."

The Tar Heels, who won their 66th straight home opener, trailed at halftime and through most of the second half until Stackhouse rallied his team, who could become No. 1 following top-ranked Arkansas' 104-80 loss to No. 3 Massachusetts on Friday.

"I could care less about that," Stackhouse said when asked if the Tar Heels should be No. 1. "Give it to whoever ... I don't take much stock in those polls. ... The No. 1 team last year didn't win the national championship - that was us."

Texas, with three starters back from the team that went 26-8 last season, led for the final time at 87-86 with 4:18 left. Stackhouse, who played the entire second half, then blocked a shot and got a return feed from fellow sophomore Rasheed Wallace for a dunk that gave the Tar Heels the lead for good.

After Texas missed a 3-pointer, Stackhouse drove the baseline for a layup, then forced a turnover when he broke up an alley-oop pass on the Longhorns' next trip downcourt.

The Tar Heels, who shot 59 percent in the second half, almost threw the ball away twice in the final 41 seconds after Texas cut the lead to 92-90, but the final pass ended up in the arms of Wallace under the basket. He made the layup with 32.2 seconds left. "Wallace made a great catch at the end when Donald (Williams) was being triple-teamed in the backcourt and just had to throw the ball up near the rim," said Tar Heel coach Dean Smith.

"Carolina just came up with the big plays and the loose balls," Penders said. "There were some unbelievable plays." North Carolina's three sophomores combined for 66 points and all had career highs, with Wallace adding 20 points and 13 rebounds and Jeff McInnis 18 points. Stackhouse's previous high was 23 points against LSU last season, while Wallace had 19 against Colorado State and McInnis 16 against Virginia.

"We are really the big part of what we have this year," Stackhouse said of the trio. "We have the most experience. We were out there last year and we have a lot of minutes under our belt. We know how to win."

UM dominates Arkansas in all areas

Minutemen combine defense and rebounding with desire to pummel national champs

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD—"UMass basketball."

The phrase has become a favorite buzz word for Massachusetts men's basketball Coach John Calipari in describing the way he wants his team to play.

It was "UMass basketball," that led the No. 3 Massachusetts Minutemen to a suprising 104-80 rout over the defending National Champion No. 1 Arkansas Razorbacks.

UMass basketball according to Calipari is "swarming defense, relentless rebounding, and unselfish basketball."

"I think we saw that we haven't gotten away from what's made us good," Calipari said.

That swarming defense was especially effective in shutting down National Player of the Year candidate Corliss Williamson and senior point guard Corey Beck.

Beck entered the arena for the pregame shoot-around with one finger in the air signifying the Razorbacks No. 1 ranking. When he left the game with 6:52 remaining, he had five fouls, zero points, and his team was down by 16. A victim of "UMass basketball."

"We swarmed," Calipari said. "We played the way we play."

Another key to Calipari's formula for success is agressive rebounding. The Minutemen crashed the boards with reckless abandon outrebounding the vaunted Arkansas front court 34 to 34.

Lou Roe led the way, hauling down 13 rebounds. Sophomore center Marcus Camby, who played only 17 minutes due to foul trouble, collected 12 boards, one shy of his career high. Those rebounds were the story of the game as Massachusetts outscored Arkansas 69-39 inside with 18 points coming off offensive rebounds.

"The biggest thing we did was rebound," Calipari said. "Our guards were running down balls that were big balls for us."

"The difference in the ball game was that they wanted the ball more than we did," said Arkansas Coach Nolan Richardson. "You have to give them credit because they really got after the basketball."

Perhaps the most essential part of what Calipari preaches is to never be complacent or give up. Down 16 points at halftime the Razorbacks came out looking to start one of their tradeamark runs. Instead of having their lead chipped away however, the Minutemen continued their onslaught to eventually win by 24.

"I told the team we were going to start this half like it was 0-0," Calipari said. "We wanted to try to beat them in the second half."

"Normally we'd be the team that comes out with the run," Williamson said. "The run wasn't there for us tonight."

The depth of the Massachusetts bench will be crucial if the Minutemen are to achieve their goal of a deep run in the NCAA tournament. Calipari used his bench effectively against the Razorbacks. The small forward combination of Donta Bright and Dana Dingle was impressive in limiting the performance of Arkansas swingman Scotty Thurman. Calipari gave a vote of confidence to freshman center Inus Sorville, who responded with five points and three rebounds (two offensive) in six minutes of play.

"I thought Inus was great, I was very pleased," Calipari said. "He gave us good quality minutes."

A year ago, when the Minutemen fell to Kansas in the final game of the Preseason NIT, their free-throw shooting percentage was an abysmal .613 (19 of 31). That game was not forgoten and the dedication to improving their shooting from the charity stripe paid off as UMass

Several UMass players step into important roles

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — It is virtually impossible to defeat a team of Arkansas' caliber without those certain players who turn it up a notch in lieu of the opponent.

In No. 3 Massachusetts' 104-80 drubbing of No. 1 Arkansas, there were a number of those certain players. With the absence of guard Mike Williams, who sat out the final game of his three-game suspension due to team academic violations, the Minutemen were in dire need of a total team effort. And they got one.

The player who stepped it up the most on Friday night was Donta Bright. The junior forward scored 24 points and grabbed eight rebounds, and did it in typical Donta Bright– fashion — diving for loose balls, aggressiveness off the offensive glass [4 offensive rebounds], all-out hustle.

"I think the guy that made a difference in the game was the guy sitting beside me," said Calipari, with Bright seated next to him. "I think Donta Bright was the difference in us being on the floor with them and us beating them."

In the first half with just under 10 minutes to play, Bright increased the lead to 10, 29–19, with seven unanswered points that included three straight jumpers and a free throw. He finished the first half with 11 points on 4–7 shooting form the field and had four rebounds.

The second half scoring done by Bright was mainly from behind the free throw line [7–8], meaning he remained active on the offensive glass throughout the entire game.

"For the team and for the program, where it's been in the past and where it's at now, I think a lot of people thought we couldn't come out here and play the way we did," Bright said. "We proved [something] to everybody out here who thought Arkansas was going to just blow us off the court.

"Like Coach [Calipari] said, we just had to rebound, play with passion, and play within ourselves, and everybody accept their roles."

Calipari has seen improvement in Bright since last season.

"One of the things we talked about to Donta all of last year and all of last summer was improving his scoring, improving his shooting, playing within himself, one dribble pull-ups. And he did that.

"He's shooting the ball, he was 10–11 from the free throw line. He passed up a three, which really surprised me, I thought that was out of his hands. He passed it and we got a play inside. Not only did he shoot and score, but he rebounded," Calipari said.

Calipari had to take Bright aside at the end of the game because he was concerned about that his player was getting away from his game.

"There were three or four balls that he could've gotten that he didn't get. And I was on him because I wanted him to understand that that's his game. I felt he was the difference," Calipari said.

• Lou Roe, who was named Most Valuable Player of the Tip Off Classic for his 34-point, 13-board performance, surprisingly dominated All-America Corliss Williamson [15 points, seven rebounds]. Roe frustrated Williamson for the full 40 minutes, as the immense Razorback forward had four turnovers and fouled out late in the second half.

UMass loses two at tourney

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team went to the Lady Kats Invitational this past weekend hoping to come away with the first place trophy.

E. Michigan	58
Massachusetts	55

Instead, the Minutewomen left Lexington with two tough losses to the Kentucky Lady Kats, 73–55, and the Eastern Michigan Eagles, 58–55.

On Friday, UMass took on the Lady Kats. The first half was close throughout with the biggest lead for either team being five points.

PAUL BRODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Junior Melissa Gurile turned in two impressive performances in the Lady Kats Invitational, but it was not enough as the Minutewomen fell to 0–2.

UMass had its biggest lead, 27–22, after a Sabriya Mitchell 17-footer with 6:16 left. The Lady Kats battled back however to tie it at 28 on a Stacey Reed shot off the glass at the 4:52 mark. The Minutewomen headed into the locker room down only by a point, 33–32.

The Lady Kats started off the second half with an 8–2 run, making the score 41–34, that the Minutewomen would never recover from. UMass did get within two, 41–39, on a Beth Kuzmeski field goal and three pointer, but from there on they were outplayed.

It was a four point game, 47–43, at the 10:34 but the Lady Kats went on an 15–5 run to make it 62–48 and put the game out of reach.

From that point Kentucky's lead never dipped below 10. The Minutewomen made it a 10-point game on an Octavia Thomas layup after a steal. The Lady Kats finished the game with an 11–3 run, to win by 18 points, 73–55.

Kuzmeski finished with a team-high 16 points on 6–11 shooting from the field, 4–8 from three point land. Gurile collected a double-double (14 points and a team-high 10 rebounds) to go along with four blocks. Thomas was the third Minutewomen in double figures in scoring finishing with 10 points. Freshman Tez Krafi had seven points and four rebounds.

Kentucky	73
Massachusetts	55

The Consolation game against Eastern Michigan was a game that the Minutewomen should of won.

UMass was up by 12 points, 53–41, with 4:54 left to go in the game. But from there, the Eagles went on a 13–2 run to win the game. Eastern Michigan guard September Silvers hit a runner in the lane with 44 seconds left to lift the Eagles to the 58–55 come-from-behind win.

The Minutewomen were ahead at the half 34–29. The two teams exchanged leads throughout the first 11 minutes, but UMass took the lead and kept it at the 8:57 mark on a Krafi baseline jumper, making it 18–17. The Minutewomen stretched their lead to six points.

GPA list not required by NCAA

■ Race-based records compiled for University use

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

The win by the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team over the defending national champions has been marred by the continuing controversy over the rights of students–athletes.

According to the 1994–1995 National Collegiate Athletic Association Manual, the NCAA does not require schools under its jurisdiction to keep separate lists of grade point averages for student–athletes based on race and ethnic background.

Both UMass and the NCAA have revised their earlier statements regarding the requirement of the University to keep separate lists of GPAs for student–athletes.

Chancellor David K. Scott admits making a mistake when he told a Boston Globe reporter that the "university is compelled by the National Collegiate Athletic Association to keep a breakdown of athletes grades by racial and ethnic origin."

"I made the mistake of giving the impression or saying that data containing GPAs were part of the requirement," Scott said yesterday.

UMass is required by law to submit aggregate graduation rates to the NCAA, which are categorized by race, gender and ethnicity, according to Scott. The data UMass gives the NCAA is not done individually, nor does it contain the GPA of any individual student–athlete.

The NCAA has also corrected their statement about their requirements. In an article published in the Globe, Kathryn M. Reith, NCAA director of public information, said that she was incorrect in stating that the NCAA requires keeping GPAs by race.

Reith said universities must submit data only on graduation rates of whites, Blacks, Hispanics and other groups.

"There is no reason that I know of for UMass to keep track of GPA by ethnicity," Reith said. "There's no form they have to fill out for us."

Reith told the Globe that the NCAA requires graduation rates separated by race, gender and ethnicity in order to determine whether minority students are being discriminated against by their university. According to Reith, the data helps them track the student–athletes' progress.

"We track those rates specifically so that Black student– athletes won't be exploited by the system," she said. "We want to see how they're progressing, so they aren't being used by the system."

Sherbin said one of the reasons athletic support services track student–athletes by race and gender is because the University is concerned about possible "patterns developing along racial and gender lines."

The University is now saying that the academic data which is compiled for student–athletes is voluntarily done by UMass as part of an academic support program for athletes, according to Sherbin.

"Athletic services, when it looks over the raw data of a student's academic record, will look at the race of that student — whether it be Black, white, whatever — if the student provided that information," Sherbin said in a press release.

"UMass is interested in our student–athletes for their entire career here, not just upon their entry and departure," Sherbin said.

According to Sherbin, "there are academic support services outside of the athletic department that are designed to meet the needs of students of a particular race or ethnic origin."

The University offers programs to minority students such as the Bilingual Collegiate Program for Hispanics, the Collegiate Committee for the Education of Blacks and other Minority Students, and the United Asia Learning Center.

"By using the raw data, the athletic department knows immediately what supplemental services to recommend to the athlete," Sherbin said.

Sherbin said one of the reasons athletic support services track student–athletes by race and gender is because the University is concerned about possible "patterns developing along racial and gender lines."

"We are concerned about possible patterns because historically there have been differences in the educational and social opportunities afforded people based on race and gender," Sherbin said.

"These differences can affect the way people learn, their study needs, their levels of academic preparedness," Sherbin said.

Black students at UMass were outraged after learning that the administration follows the academic progress of student– athletes by breaking down grades according to race.

Approximately 70 Blacks students met with Scott and other faculty Nov. 2 to discuss their concerns about the violation of rights of Black student–athletes.

The information became public after Brad Smith, a reporter from the Springfield Union–News, released confidential academic information of student–athletes during a journalism class. The material contained both transcripts of players on the UMass men's basketball team and a list of names and GPAs of Black athletes.

To produce the material required by the NCAA, the University must first compile academic information for student–athletes individually, according to Scott.

"To get to the information that the NCAA asks for, you have to start with 'raw data' — which includes student– athletes' grades," Scott said.

The academic information which Smith received was part of the raw data compiled by the University, according to Scott.

Jeffrey Dahmer dead, prisoner held in slaying

By Arthur L. Srb
Associated Press

Serial killer and fellow inmate attacked on a cleaning detail in prison bathroom

MADISON, Wis. — Jeffrey Dahmer was attacked and killed while cleaning a prison bathroom Monday in a gruesome end for the man who strangled and dismembered 17 boys and men and cannibalized some of them.

Another inmate was being held in Dahmer's slaying and in the severe beating of another prisoner at Columbia Correctional Institution. Authorities wouldn't identify the suspect, who was serving a life sentence for murder, or offer a motive.

"It's not as brutal as what he did to our children," said Shirley Hughes, a mother of one of Dahmer's victims. "This was just a quick way out."

Dahmer had been in prison since July 1991, when a handcuffed man who had escaped his clutches led police to an apartment containing body parts packed in oil drums, skulls saved as mementos and one or two hearts Dahmer said he had set aside "to eat later."

"Dahmer had a death wish, and I know he didn't have the gumption to do it himself, so I had predicted that the day would come when he would be killed in prison," said Gerald Boyle, Dahmer's lawyer at trial.

The 34-year-old former chocolate factory worker, who was serving 16 life sentences, had been attacked in prison once before. In July, an inmate tried to cut his throat during a chapel service, but the razor blade attached to a plastic handle fell apart before it could hurt Dahmer.

Monday's attack occurred as all three men were working on a cleaning detail in the recreation area of the maximum-security prison.

A bloody broom handle was found at the scene, but Corrections Secretary Michael Sullivan said he didn't know if it was the murder weapon.

"One could surmise a number of things. Their heads could have been smashed against a wall," Sullivan said.

"There was a great deal of blood in the area of the attack," said Corrections Department spokesman Joe Scislowicz.

Dahmer had extensive head injuries and died at a hospital about an hour after he was found.

At the time of the July attack, Sullivan said that it appeared to have been an isolated incident and that Dahmer was not believed to be in imminent danger.

"Oh my God! My son! How could this happen?" Dahmer's mother, Joyce Flint, said when TV's "Hard Copy" informed her of his death.

The other victim in Monday's attack was Jesse Anderson, who was serving a life sentence for stabbing and bludgeoning his wife to death. Anderson's case drew widespread attention in Wisconsin because of his claim that two black men attacked him and his wife, both white, as they left a restaurant.

Dahmer's body was found in the staff's bathroom and shower area next to the basketball court. Anderson was found in the prisoners' bathroom across the court and was hospitalized in critical condition with head injuries.

A guard overseeing the three inmates had just left the basketball court when the attack occurred, Sullivan said. He did not know the whereabouts of another guard assigned to watch the prisoners.

"He never expressed fear," his stepmother, Shari Dahmer, told WJW-TV in Cleveland. "From the day he was arrested he felt he deserved anything that he got."

Dahmer's father, Lionel Dahmer, told TV's "A Current Affair" his son feared for his life when first jailed in Milwaukee, "but he felt that he was well protected at that high maximum security prison."

If he could speak to his son again, he said, "I would want Jeff to know the only real consolation I have is that he is with our creator."

Proposition 187 divides Calif., targets immigrants

■ Socioeconomic ills blamed on aliens

By Juan Jose Chacon Quiros de Quetzalcoatl
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the first in a four-part series.

PROP 187 News Analysis

In the 1700s, the town of Salem, Mass., was suffering social and economic difficulties. According to the town inhabitants, a group of old and mostly poor women had conspired with the devil to produce the hardships. They were later tortured and burned, but the socioeconomic situation in Salem did not change.

A similar situation could be taking place today in the United States. Immigrants are increasingly being accused of problems ranging from crime to budgetary problems. Some say they are "trying to bring fairness to this society," while others call it "California reverting to its scapegoating ways."

Earlier this month, the people of California voted to make Proposition 187 into law. According to immigrant rights advocates, "Proposition 187 is the most extreme measure proposed in recent memory."

Incidents against immigrants date to 1871 when 17 Chinese men were tortured and hanged by a mob. More recently, in 1943, thousands of American serviceman took to the streets of Los Angeles, beating up young Mexican males since the soldiers had to go to war while young Mexicans stayed at home.

Today, some of the same incidents are taking place along the border between California and Mexico.

"It's time to restore reason, integrity and fairness to our nation's immigration policy. And we need to do it now. California can't afford to wait," said Gov. Pete Wilson while campaigning last spring. Although Wilson did not endorse Proposition 187 at first, he decided to do it after a poll suggested that most Californians supported the measure. His gamble paid off with another term as governor.

But Proposition 187 is different from previous efforts against immigrants that came from congressional proposals. This is a grass–roots initiative that has become law through a referendum. "In California, the democratic process has made possible the creation and enforcement of a system of apartheid," said 16-year-old Raul, an immigrant from Guatemala.

According to the proposed law, the people of California "have suffered and are suffering economic hardship caused by the presence of illegal aliens in this state." But the findings of this law go even further when it claims that the people of California "have suffered and are suffering personal injury and damage caused by the criminal conduct of illegal aliens in this state."

However, an examination of the headlines in the San Diego Union and the San Diego Tribune makes the accused look like the victim: "Another body found in estuary." "Salvadoran killed crossing freeway." "Three killed while crossing freeway, Boy's condition is critical." "Driver charged with manslaughter, reckless driving in border accident." "Mexico claims incursion by Border Patrol agents." "500 foot wide 'DMZ' proposed at border." "49 died in '91 trying to swim Rio Grande." "One way to evict migrants from camp." "INS Guard indicted in abuse incident." "Another Juan Doe chills out." "Tactics at Border Checkpoint under fire."

If implemented, the law will ban

Father's death leads to second charge of vehicular homicide in Nov. 9 crash

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

BELCHERTOWN — A driver charged with operating under the influence of alcohol in an accident on Route 9 now faces two counts of motor vehicle homicide.

The father of a 5-year-old boy killed in a Nov. 9 crash outside the entrance of the Windsor Dam and Quabbin Reservoir died on Friday.

Julia Goldberg, 35, of Belchertown has been charged with a second count of motor vehicle homicide after Joseph Furtado, 50, of Turners Falls died at the University of Massachusetts Medical Center in Worcester, according to State Police Lt. Robert Gosselin.

Furtado died due to complications from burns he received in a fire caused by the accident, according to Gosselin.

"Approximately 75 percent of Furtado's body was burned in the fire," Gosselin said.

The accident occurred when Goldberg pulled her white Porsche out of the Quabbin Reservoir entrance into the lane of Furtado's moving van which was traveling east, according to Belchertown Police Sergeant William Zobka.

The two vehicles collided and the van continued east, swerving to the side of the road, hitting a tree and exploding into flames, Zobka said.

Police arrived on the scene minutes after the accident to find Furtado outside of the moving van with his son, Zobka said.

Furtado suffered extensive burns from the fire. His son, Justin Furtado, who would have turned 6 years old this month, was pronounced dead by the state medical examiner, according to Gosselin.

Both drivers were taken to UMass Medical Center. Goldberg was treated for her injuries and released.

Furtado's wife, who was driving behind the moving van in a family car, was one of several witnesses to the accident.

The Massachusetts State Police Reconstruction Team also arrived at the scene and, according to Gosselin, the investigation into the accident has been completed.

"I expect a report on my desk by the end of this week," Gosselin said.

He reported that a discrepancy in the eyewitnesses' accounts of the accident prolonged the investigation.

In addition to the two counts of motor vehicle homicide, Goldberg has been charged with operating under the influence of alcohol, failing to stop at a stop sign, and crossing marked lines.

According to Gosselin, Goldberg will be called to Ware District Court.

■ Social services denied under Prop. 187

illegal immigrants from access to public services including health care and education. Sec. 5 of the law deals with exclusion of illegal aliens from public social services.

"If any public entity in this state to whom a person has applied for public social services determines or reasonably suspects . . . that the person is an alien in the United States in violation of federal law," the person will be denied the service, and the agency will notify the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

The problem for the residents of California is that two out five of them are immigrants. Therefore, they could easily be suspected of being illegal immigrants based on the color of their skin, their names, or their command of the English language.

Representative José E. Serrano is a third-term democrat from New York and chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. He was born an American citizen. "I resent having to prove I am a citizen. And if you ask me for papers right now, I cannot prove it. Neither could you, but most of you will never have to. I will because of my first name or my accent, and I resent it."

While campaigning to defeat initiatives like Proposition 187, Serrano has emphasized its racist characteristics. "On behalf of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, I beg you, as its chairman, to change your minds. And if not, to stand up and admit the truth: That this is just being mean.

"This does not reduce the national deficit. This does not address our real problems with immigration. We open doors, but as soon as you see dark-skinned people coming though that door, you close it."

Proposition 187 also makes teachers, social workers and medical personnel into enforcement officials. Sec. 7 of the law, for example, deals with exclusion of illegal aliens from public elementary and secondary schools. "By Jan. 1, 1996, each school district shall have verified the legal status of each child already enrolled and in attendance in the school district in order to ensure the enrollment or attendance only of citizens, aliens lawfully admitted as permanent residents . . . . By Jan. 1, 1996, each school district shall also have verified the legal status of each parent or guardian of each child."

There is agreement among many law experts that this section of the law could be ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Until now, a California court has kept the law from being implemented. The Supreme Court ruled in a previous case that it is unconstitutional to deny children, no matter what their legal status is, admission to school.

An estimated 400,000 children will be denied access to education if Proposition 187 is implemented. Sociologists suggest that this would create an underclass of poor and illiterate children and that it could add new members to the spiraling growth of gangs.

In a Los Angeles prenatal care clinic the day after the elections, half of the women scheduled for appointments did not show up. "I don't want to be in jail even if I have to sacrifice my health for it," said Maria Isabel, a 6-month pregnant woman who came to California two years ago. If born in this country, her child would be a citizen of the United States.

For many, the crisis in this country has nothing to do with immigration and more to do with the system. "Like the migrating Negro, the Latino is now blamed for the crisis of the faltering capitalist economy. . . .The reality is that if we didn't have one single Latino in America, we'd still be hurting," said Joe Williams in an opinion piece for La Sentinel. "We are hurting in areas of this country where the Latino community doesn't even exist."

"This does not address our real problems with immigration. We open doors, but as soon as you see dark-skinned people coming though that door, you close it."

Father Bill Leininger is part of an interfaith task force in Santa Clara County that has joined ranks with the immigrants. One of their statement reads: "As representatives of the Jewish, Buddhist, Christian and Islamic traditions, we unanimously condemn this current surge of scapegoating immigrants as not only short-sighted, misdirected and mean-spirited but as blatantly contrary to our shared belief in the intrinsic worth of every person and to the radical right of the individual to pursue life, freedom and human fulfillment wherever they can be found."

California has yet to prove if it's ready to defend such principles. In the meantime, Californians are waiting for the implementation of a law that could make the riots following the verdict in the Rodney King case look like child's play. Just before the elections, 100,000 people marched through the streets of Los Angeles to protest Proposition 187, the largest number in California's history.

Weld proposes new welfare plan

By Robert W. Trott
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Weld administration and two liberal Democratic senators reached tentative agreement Monday on a welfare reform plan that would require recipients 25 years old and younger to find a job within 90 days.

"We are still intent on getting this resolved in 1994," said Sen. Dianne Wilkerson, D-Boston.

The proposal was worked out by Wilkerson, Sen. Lois Pines and Weld policy chief Mary Lee King.

It would require able-bodied welfare recipients 25 and younger to work at least 25 hours a week, although half could spend up to 15 hours of that time getting job training or education.

Now, 107,000 people receive Aid to Families with Dependent Children. Under the plan, about 16,000 are 25 or younger and would have to find work.

In lieu of the monthly cash payment, the recipients would receive day care, Medicaid health care benefits and transportation costs.

King described the proposal as an "agreement-in-principle." Earlier this year, lawmakers approved a bill setting new limits on benefits and giving able-bodied recipients the option of enrolling in school or job training, or getting private-sector jobs that would be subsidized by the state.

Weld vetoed that plan, saying he wanted recipients to be required to work immediately.

The House overrode his veto, but the Senate failed to so do by one vote. Wilkerson and Pines provided key votes in upholding the override, and have been negotiating with the administration for weeks on a compromise.

It was unclear how far the plan would go.

House Speaker Charles Flaherty, D-Cambridge, essentially called the bill dead on arrival.

He said he did not want to put House members through the "anguish" of another long, drawn-out debate over welfare reform. He said the attitude of Pines, Wilkerson and Weld that they could produce an 11th-hour compromise was "Pollyannish."

When Pines and Wilkerson joined forces with Senate Republicans to uphold Weld's veto in August, a parliamentary move left the vote open. Senate President William Bulger, D-Boston, has said the override will come up for another vote this week.

King and the senators were vague on specifics Monday night, saying minor questions still needed to be worked out. They said aides would begin drawing up a bill immediately.

King would not say the governor would put his name on the bill. And even Weld, who made tough welfare reform a cornerstone of his landslide re-election, showed little enthusiasm for the compromise.

"I'm not prepared to say anything's unamendable," he said. But Pines insisted that lawmakers would be open to the plan because "this is a bill the governor will have put his stamp of approval on."

To spur action on welfare, Weld funded the program only for eight months, instead of a full year. As it stands now, welfare money will run out at the end of February.

Clinton makes final push for GATT

By Martin Crutsinger
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton assembled the economic stars from eight previous administrations on Monday to give a final push for congressional approval of a 124-nation trade agreement. "We have to do it now. We can't wait until next year," he declared.

Supporters predicted that the rewrite of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade would sail through the House on Tuesday with perhaps as many as 60 votes to spare.

However, they suffered two setbacks in the Senate on Monday with the announcements that Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., and Sen. Hank Brown, R-Colo., would oppose the agreement.

Baucus had voted for the pact when it cleared the Senate Finance Committee in October. He said he had switched because of growing concern that the World Trade Organization was a threat to U.S. sovereignty, in part because voting would not reflect a country's economic size.

Brown said he too had started out as a supporter but switched after studying the agreement in preparation for taking a quiz Monday as part of a bet with consumer advocate Ralph Nader, a GATT opponent.

Even before the announcements by Brown and Baucus, the fate of the trade deal was less certain in the 100-member Senate, where it must win 60 votes on a procedural question of waiving the Senate's budget rules.

However, administration officials expressed confidence they can still prevail. Clinton spent part of his day telephoning undecided senators.

Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Rufus Yerxa said that opponents were wrong to attack the one-country-one-vote rule because in reality the WTO, like GATT, will make no major decisions without unanimous consent.

The 22,000-page agreement slashes tariffs by an average of 38 percent worldwide and expands the rules of world trade into new areas such as agriculture, services and the protection of copyrights and patents. It creates a more powerful World Trade Organization to referee trade disputes and eliminates the power of any one country to block an adverse trade ruling.

During a crowded GATT pep rally in the East Room, the administration produced a letter signed by two former Republican presidents, Gerald Ford and George Bush, and Democrat Jimmy Carter, urging congressional approval.

Clinton acknowledged fears that the agreement, by lowering U.S. trade barriers as well as those of other countries, would mean U.S. workers would face even more competition from low-wage workers in other countries.

Unattended candle cause of fire

Furniture was damaged but no one was injured in a Sunday night fire on the second floor of Van Meter Residence Hall.

The fire alarm went off at 10:11 p.m. after an unprotected candle flame ignited a cloth tapestry hanging on the wall, according to Barbara Pitoniak from the University of Massachusett's New Office.

The candle in room 209 was left unattended and when the occupants of the room returned, the flames had spread from the tapestry to a chair and a rug, Pitoniak said.

Other students extinguished the fire with portable fire extinguishers, Pitoniak said. There were no injuries.

The Amherst Fire Department responded to the alarm and the dormitory was temporarily evacuated, Pitoniak said.

The resident director could not be reached but a spokesperson from Building Operations said they were working on repainting the room.

Women's studies class discusses race

Professor hopes to 'recognize racism for the disease that it is'

By M. Isabel Tereso
Collegian Correspondent

Have you heard a racist comment in class, at work, on a date, or at a social or family gathering and been afraid or unsure of how to deal or respond to the situation? Are you upset with the assumption that you were in compliance with someone's racist beliefs?

"Let's Talk About Race" is a new one-credit course to be offered next semester through the Department of Women's Studies.

A main objective of the class is to outline solutions to the everyday occurrences of racism and to begin to articulate the boundaries between what is offensive and unacceptable behavior when the issue is race.

The course will be taught by an undergraduate women's studies major named Kaolin and is open to all undergraduates, graduate students and professors. Only undergraduates will receive academic credit.

Kaolin said that she has noticed that students are feeling overwhelmed, angry and confused about how to handle racism and assumptions made about their compliance to it.

According to Kaolin, many students don't maintain racist instincts but are unsure of how to proceed and take a stand with confidence when confronted with racism. Students with good intentions are likely to succumb to racism because the issues are overwhelming, Kaolin said.

She described the purpose of the class as helping to bring to the surface the difficult layers of guilt, shock, shame and revulsion many students experience when they begin to recognize racism for the disease that it is.

Kaolin said it is not easy to own up to the harm our ancestors have inflicted on people of color, nor is it comfortable to notice racism in ourselves and others.

Kaolin also said that it is not easy to correct behavior, but she hopes the "Let's Talk About Race" will provide students with an opportunity to begin to break down the dynamics and subconscious motivators that contribute to racism. The class will address the impact racism has already had on students, their families, friendships and politics.

Course requirements include readings from Memoir of a Race Traitor by Mab Segrest, keeping a journal, one field trip, and four assignments. Two films will also be shown, but students' lives will be the class focus, with less analytical criticism of others.

Of the four assignments, one will be a community observation of a child care center, community board meeting, campus meeting, another class, or another mutually agreed upon observation of the effect race has upon relations in a formal setting.

Another assignment involves bringing in music and discussing the responses it evokes and its connections to other cultures.

Additionally, students are required to attend two open meetings of the course to be held in the Campus Center Auditorium. For the fourth assignment, students will conduct an interview, real or hypothetical, with a person that integrates the considerations of race that were covered in class.

There will be no tests. Students' talents, interests and skills will be incorporated in the work to be done, as the class seeks to uncover the ways in which racism can be dismantled.

Kaolin said she hopes to create viable enduring relationships that encourage students to become more aware of their solidarity and ability to engage in creative confrontation.

As of yet, there is no six-digit schedule number for "Let's Talk About Racism," but the course number is 296, and it will be an extension of Arlene Avakian's Women's Studies 201 class, "Feminist Perspectives." Anyone interested in registering for the course or obtaining more information should call Kaolin at 584-4996.

WMUA to play matchmaker next spring

By Tim White

WMUA will try to bring a little love to local air waves next semester.

According to WMUA General Manager Brad Davidson, the radio version of "The Dating Game" will hopefully bring entertainment to the University of Massachusetts campus.

Set to begin at the beginning of the spring semester, the show will take place in two separate studios, one containing the contestant and the other containing three potential dates, Davidson said.

"It will be interesting because people are so concerned with outside appearances," Davidson said. "So they can find out what kind of person they are, and not what they look like. People are too concerned with appearance."

The single contestant can be male or female, said Joshua Eilberg, director of public affairs at WMUA who is assisting Davidson in the show.

There will also be a call-up portion of the program when the listening audience can call in their votes. The call will not be broadcasted over the air, according to Davidson.

"We are still regulated by the FCC (Federal Communications Commission)," Davidson said. "We can't air anything obscene. I do a show now called 'UMass Talks,' though, and I haven't run into any problems."

According to Davidson, the contestant will ask the three potential dates questions. The questions will also have to fall under FCC regulations.

"The guests get to choose the questions they're going to ask," Davidson said. "But I'll screen the questions before hand."

Eilberg said members of WMUA have been generally positive about the new idea but he thinks there are a few negative feelings.

"We've got some interesting responses from the female directors," Eilberg said. "They think we might be trying to be sleazy, but we're not."

Sharon Murphy, office coordinator at WMUA, said she has no problem with the show.

"It's an interesting way to meet people," Murphy said. "I'd do it."

Davidson said the hour-long show would also devote a half hour to seeing how past contestants have done on the actual date.

"People would win tickets to the movies or dinner or something," Davidson said. "We'd invite them back and ask them how it went."

There may also be an advice section at the end of the show where people write in with their problems.

"I will be giving the advice, so I don't know how good it will be," Davidson said.

Currently the untitled show is scheduled for every Tuesday from 6 p.m. to 7 p.m., but WMUA has to get contestants to fill the 13-week semester.

"Brad has been plugging it on 'UMass Talks,'" Eilberg said. "He said the response has been good."

Davidson said he would not exclude the idea of having homosexuals on the program.

"I haven't received any calls from anyone who isn't heterosexual," he said. "But I wouldn't exclude anything."

Davidson said he currently has about 15 contestants lined up.

"Hopefully it will offer a good source of entertainment for UMass students," Davidson said. "And maybe to hook a few people up."

Death doesn't erase Nixon's faults

Peter J. Orvetti

We have an odd habit in this country of praising people when they die no matter how disgraceful their lives may have been. I had not planned to comment on the last crisis of Richard Milhous Nixon. But since Nixon's death, I have been surprised by the number of people who have praised him, or who don't seem to know much about him at all.

He has died and now he will have to deal with whatever god he meets on his own terms. Why was he so hated, though? His life cannot fit into this space; for a fuller version, see Tom Wicker's 1991 book, One Of Us. Here is a brief version of Nixon's career.

Nixon was born in poverty to parents who did not believe in expressing love. A letter he wrote to his mother at age 10 was signed, "Your faithful dog, Richard." He had to start work at 10, and made it to college on his own with a burning resentment for those of privilege.

His cold childhood and his anger at the higher classes drove Nixon to politics, seeking respect and revenge. He became a subliminal Joe McCarthy, using manipulative tactics to brand a Congressional opponent and a Senate opponent as communists through subtle imagery as well as doctored facts. In the Senate race, the Nixon campaign employed anti-Semitism against the opponent's Jewish husband. (Anti-Semitism would be a recurring theme in Nixon's political career and in private, "Jew" was the term he used to describe those he hated, whether they were Jewish or not.)

In Congress, he branded an obscure, effective State Department official, Alger Hiss, as a communist spy and sent him to prison. His anti-communist crusades landed him a spot on the 1952 Republican ticket as Dwight Eisenhower's vice president. Nixon was elected despite rumors that he was operating a secret slush fund.

Nixon's tenure as vice president was long and sad. He resented being cut out of Ike's inner circle and was even publicly mocked by the president. Eisenhower did not like Nixon and tried to force him off the 1956 ticket. Nixon's one noted suggestion during his vice presidency was the use of nuclear weaponry at Dienbienphu, Vietnam, to support the retreating French. He was nominated for president in 1960 and defeated by John Kennedy.

Nixon returned to win the presidency in 1968. Although he had a fairly good civil rights record, Nixon adopted the infamous "Southern strategy" for the next election, namely the Republican strategy of appealing to Southern racists by race-baiting and toning down civil rights measures — not surprising from a man who regularly incited protesters to heckle him simply so he could exploit it to his next conservative audience.

Nixon was, hands down, the most intelligent president of this century. Unfortunately, his presidency was based on a drive for survival, not reform. Having lived in poverty, he truly desired to make people's lives better but his extreme paranoia led him to massive abuse of power. He did institute some surprisingly progressive social measures.

Other than that, his term is marked by the installation of a dictatorship in Chile, the use of illegal measures to suppress dissent, the Kent State massacre and the prosecutorial inaction that followed, the U.S. invasion of Cambodia (the United States has invaded a non-hostile nation since the Mexican War), the keeping of an enemies list, and the madman theory. His two greatest successes, opening China and establishing detente with the Soviets, are now viewed as inevitable acts that would have occurred under any administration.

The madman theory was Nixon's plan to end the war in Vietnam by convincing Hanoi's government that he was insane. He did this by ordering random, intense bombings of strategically unimportant areas, like villages. It was not the prosecution of a war; it was genocide.

The Watergate scandals that led to his resignation cannot be fully recounted here. In summary, they consisted of creating false documents on "Muskie for President" stationery, creating an illegal slush fund, bugging Democratic headquarters, plotting the assassination of a political columnist, destruction of evidence, ignoring a Supreme Court subpoena, ordering the dismissal of the man appointed to prosecute him.

In his final days, Richard Nixon neared insanity. Many feared he would start a nuclear war just to avoid impeachment. He talked to paintings and had to have his gun taken away for fear that he would shoot himself in the Oval Office.

Some have said Richard Milhous Nixon is too complicated to understand. He isn't. He was a tortured, unloved man who would do anything for approval and power. He would use any tactic to survive. To the day he died, he refused to admit he had done anything wrong. His only comment was, "When the president does it, it is not illegal."

Nixon led a painful life but he took it out on the world exponentially. He cared more for his own survival than he did for the country, or the world. Nixon was a crook. High office does not a hero make. A man's death does not make him a better man.

Don't grump about Xmas greetings

Alexis George

Everyone has a complaint about the holiday season. We turn the season that is renowned for its spirit of goodwill into one of endless complaints.

I suppose the complaining has become a tradition, just like the endless Santa Clauses, sappy movies, and the Christmas tree displays put up in stores long before even Thanksgiving. These are the traditions that we have come to know and expect and, if we dare admit it, love.

After all, what would the holidays be like without all this sheer madness? Possibly. . . a tiny bit dull? Admit it, we enjoy the challenges of finding a parking space at the stores and battling crowds. We put up a good fight, and if we emerge with the perfect gift, it is a triumph well worth the shoving matches and minor manglings.

The "perfect gift." Now that, to me, is a complete enigma when it comes time to find one for certain people. We've all heard of "the person who has everything," and we all know someone like this.

Even if they don't actually have everything, they only seem to want something absolutely unattainable, like a new job. Somehow, new clothes or some books seem to fall a little short.

The worst people, though, are those for whom nothing is ever good enough. Be they cousins, a friend or even your parents, they are the ones who really dampen my holiday spirit. I always end up feeling slightly put out and decide that there's no reason to bother with them at all, since they obviously don't appreciate any of my efforts.

Then there are those who complain about the fact that Christmas is a Christian holiday that pervades our multicultural society. It is said that this takes away from other religions and that it makes people of these religions feel uncomfortable.

I'm sure this may be true in some cases but I'm equally sure that the people who cheerily wish us all a "Merry Christmas" do not do so with the intent of inflicting severe mental pain on anybody.

After all, no one wears a sign declaring his or her religious affiliation. How are people to know? In general, we live in a society of friendly, generous people, and to suggest that the practice of wishing a holiday greeting on someone be curbed would be to suggest elimination of an important facet of society.

Just the other day, an elderly lady in a shoe store wished me a happy Thanksgiving and it wasn't the greeting that made me happy — it was the sincerity behind it. It is this attitude that characterizes one of the nicest parts of our society.

Here's a suggestion. If you feel people are ignorant when it comes to the holiday customs of other religions, why not enlighten them?

The next time someone wishes you a "Merry Christmas," don't get steamed and upset. Smile, and reply with your religion's traditional greeting. After all, the holiday spirit, no matter how it is expressed, is in us all.

Taxachusetts? Not for the rich

Richard H. Gilluly

A year and a half ago, thoughtful Americans hoped "Reaganomics" had begun to die on the federal level with passage of President Clinton's budget bill and its features to restore some fairness to the tax code. But the resurgent GOP has launched a holy war against the poor since the elections that could make Reaganomics look like a pussycat.

And the pernicious trickle-down theorists which are the main feature of Reaganomics march on unimpeded in Bill Weld's Massachusetts through a state and local tax and fee system which hits the poor twice as hard — and the middle class one and a half times as hard — as it hits the rich as a percentage of income. It is one of the most unfair tax systems in the nation.

A measure for a graduated income tax — which would at least have taken a step toward greater equality in tax-paying in the Bay State — was rejected at the polls in November. That voters of ordinary means turned down a measure to reduce their own taxes and raise those of the wealthy is a glaring example of how ordinary Americans have been conned into shooting themselves in the foot by the greedy rich.

As the Tax Equity Alliance for Massachusetts (TEAM) says, "The widely accepted concept of taxes based on ability to pay is alien to our state."

The idea promoted by the rich — that they create jobs with the tax favors they get — is unadulterated blarney.

That's clear when you see the rich buying BMWs, Lamborghinis and other luxuries made abroad. Or commissioning 60-foot sailboats with money that would be better spent on schools for desperate distressed areas such as Holyoke, or on a decent level of appropriations for a crippled UMass which, even before Weld's Draconian cuts, never got more than a small fraction of the per-student funding available to richly endowed private universities such as Harvard and Yale.

Another myth propagated by the rich is that a graduated income tax would drive industry away to states with allegedly less onerous tax burdens.

The fact is, Massachusetts gives the rich a better break on taxes than almost any other state. Some 37 other states long ago adopted graduated income taxes, for example. Massachusetts is "Taxachusetts" only for the poor and middle.

Although these tax issues are of paramount importance to all Massachusetts residents, you'd hardly know it from reading the state's mainstream daily newspapers, which virtually ignore this issue.

Yet these papers (such as the Springfield Union-News) sail blithely along Vapid River somehow finding abundant ink to cover sleazy, hare-brained proposals for casinos, which would bring even further decline to desperately ailing cities.

There are many reasons the tax issue is of such importance to Massachusetts, but a key one is survival of the inner cities. Here are some of the ways that is so:

• When the poor pay disproportionately high taxes compared to the rich, that further drains money out of the cities where so many poor people live.

• When cities pay for most of the services they provide out of a declining property tax base, the quality of the services — especially schools — decline.

Flight from the city by those who can afford it is worsened. A graduated income tax could include a Maryland-style "piggyback" feature under which cities and poor rural areas could get immediate boosts in revenue to offset declining property taxes.

• The less fair the tax system is for the middle class, the easier it is (paradoxically) for Weld and other trickle-down theorists to persuade middle-class citizens that the poor are their enemies and that programs for the poor should be cut. Again the inner cities are hit the hardest.

The fact is, of course, the middle class has a lot more in common with the poor than it has with the rich. Because they, like the poor, are cruelly cheated by the rich under the state's tax system.

The problems of the cities eventually "trickle up" even to the most exclusive suburbs, which cannot escape the disease, crime, violence and drug abuse which are the legacies of the widespread despair caused by a savagely unequal system. And yet a Boston banker told the Boston Phoenix before the elections that a graduated income tax would constitute "class warfare" against the rich.

The rich, represented by Weld, have been waging class warfare against the middle class and the poor for years.

Opinions should stay on ed–op page

To the editor:

My reason for writing to you is that I feel your entire paper has become one large editorial page, focusing only on certain issues that fit the ideology of the writers.

In your confusion as to whether or not to print national news on a regular basis, it seems to me you only run stories supporting the opinions of your writers.

Granted they have a more serious responsibility than you do, but I still feel you do the readers a disservice by constantly pounding your agenda.

I look at today's front page and wonder if all of the headlines can really be considered news, especially when the same topic seems to be covered almost every day.

The first three words of the article by Jessica Taverna are "a conservative author," as if to warn people that what he says should not be taken seriously.

If the comments of that short article warrant that description, then I do not understand why the story does not warn people of the "liberal radicals" who you write about most of the time.

I wish that you did occasionally run a real "ed–op" page; I believe it would improve the credibility of your publication.

I firmly believe you should be allowed to print whatever you want, and the people who don't like it can simply not read it.

I enjoy reading (on the editorial page only) people who have a different opinion; it would be boring if everyone thought the same thing. That is the way it seems to go at the Collegian though, and that is unfortunate.

I believe that if you kept the editorials on the editorial page and allowed for a different perspective, occasionally your readers would benefit.

Turkey unjustly blamed for violence

To the editor:

We are responding to your article "Turkish Army Burns Kurdish Villages," written by the Maoist International Movement [Nov. 9].

Kurds live in five countries in the Middle East, namely Syria, Iran, Iraq, Turkey and Armenia. The Kurds in Turkey speak many different languages such as Kimanchi, Zazaki, Sorani, Gorani and Kurl. It is not clear if they all belong to the same ethnic group.

According to historians there never ever was an independent Kurdish state.

Until the Selchik Turks arrived, many ethnic groups lived in Anatolia, such as Urartus, Assyrians, Phynicians, Hiities, Armenians, Greeks, Romans, Laz, Kurds, etc.

Since the year 1071, Turks established themselves in South East Anatolia and to this day these lands are Turkish Lands without any interrupt ion or interval.

During the second millennium, many people moved from one land to the other. These migrations took place much later then Turks arriving Anatolia. These lands have been Turkish lands since nine centuries ago.

A group of leftist Kurds are fighting for independence and burning down the houses of those Kurds who do not join them. They are shooting teachers, doctors, nurses and are raiding the highways. They are bombing official buildings.

The Turkish army is fighting those guerrillas to save the lives of its citizens, may they be Turkish or Kurdish.

Does it ever occur to you why those guerrillas are only fighting in Turkey and not in the other four countries where there is a Kurdish population?

Equestrian team deserves recognition for regional success

To the editor:

There is a legitimate intercollegiate team on campus that hardly anyone recognizes, including the University and the Collegian.

They are currently in first place in their division. They receive no University funding, they don't receive any transportation to competitions, and they even have to pay to compete.

If you don't know what first place UMass team this is, don't worry, not many people do.

It is the UMass equestrian team, and they currently lead the Intercollegiate Horse Show Association for their division, Zone I Region III, which consists of 13 western Massachusetts colleges and universities.

This includes UMass' fiercest competition, Smith College and Mount Holyoke College.

There are nine horse shows a year with a regional final, a zone final and a national final.

The five shows for this year are over, with UMass claiming high point school for four out of those five shows while building a commanding 32-point lead over the nearest school. UMass also had the high point rider in three of these shows.

The points are awarded to riders in several different classes, including jumping. On the national level there are approximately 4,000 students competing from 235 member schools.

UMass is at a current pace to qualify for nationals this year, to be held in May at Colorado State University.

The unfortunate part of all this is that despite their success, the University won't even give the team a van to get to shows, and even though all the results from the season thus far have been given to the Collegian, there has been no report on the team whatsoever.

So if you like horses, you like winners, and you have a Saturday to spare, come out and support them on "the road to Colorado."

Small Factory no indie sell–out

By Michael Burke
Collegian Staff

FOR IF YOU CANNOT FLY
Small Factory
Vernon Yard Records

Yet another major label debut from a once esteemed indie rock band. . . This year has seen its share of albums by ex– indie rockers who have graduated to the big leagues, but this album may be the best one yet. Small Factory hardly forgets its roots as they rock through 11 pop tunes in a brief, yet rewarding, 35 minutes.

While the rest of the world was fixated on the grunge sensation in 1991, Small Factory was rocking away "unplugged" style on their acoustic instruments. Alex Kemp played bass, Dave Auchenbach was the guitarist, Phoebe Summersquash drummed, and all three shared vocal duties. Together they wrote and sang some of the happiest pop songs you will ever hear.

They first gained national attention at the Lots of Pup Losers Festival in Washington, D.C. in 1992, put on by several local indie bands. Before that, Small Factory had released a single by themselves which has since become a collectable.

Since then, the band has released several singles on the esteemed labels of Pup Narcotic, Simple Machines and Slumberland Records. Last year Small Factory released their outstanding debut, the full–length I Do Not Love You on SpinArt, which placed Small Factory among the ranks of the best indie pop rockers.

In the past year, the band has discarded their unplugged sound for a new electric feel. Major label sell-outs? Hardly. Their new sound captures the energy of Small Factory in more ways than they could before. Plus, by adding to their sound, the band isn't as limited as it once was.

From the opening chords of "The Last Time We Talked," the group rocks away with their new guitars. The lyrics are about relationships, but they are never too depressing. The band is as happy as Trent Reznor is depressed. On "Expiration Date" the band sounds like Let It Be–era Replacements.

For old fans of the band, Small Factory has not abandoned you. Acoustic numbers such as "Hi Howard I'm Back" will surely remind you of the old days when Auchenbach was strumming away on his acoustic guitar.

Small Factory has not forgotten its indie rock roots. They first do an amazing cover of "Everyone's Happy for the First Time in Weeks," which was originally done by local heroes New Radiant Storm King. They also pay homage to one of their favorite indie bands, Versus, with the catchy song "Versus Tape." And on top of that, the leader of Versus, Richard Baluyot, even helps out on guitar during the song "Expiration Date."

Without a doubt, For If You Can't Fly is one of the best albums of the year. Old fans will definitely be impressed with their revised sound while newer fans will become addicted to these marvelous pop songs like so many before them have. Small Factory is in a league of their own when it comes to pop bands. It is no surprise that SPIN called them "the most fun, super–jangly, ebullient, happy band in the country." It is more than true. A

The Dambuilders head to Pearl Street

By Michael Burke
Collegian Staff

The secret is finally out. For the past five years The Dambuilders have been reinventing pop music to the delight of rock fans in Boston and a few select outsiders. Now they are on the verge of stardom as they can be seen on MTV, on "The Conan O'Brian Show" and in Rolling Stone. And on Thursday night there's a chance to see this intriguing band at Pearl Street in Northampton.

While it seems many rock 'n' roll biographies all read the same, that is hardly the case of The Dambuilders — their history is as unique as their sound. In 1989, bassist/ vocalist Dave Derby and guitarist/ vocalist Eric Masunaga formed the band over 6,000 miles away from Boston in Honolulu.

Largely because there was no music scene in Hawaii, the duo moved to Boston. Shortly afterward, they signed to the German label Cuacha! which over the next few years released three full length albums, joining the band were violinist Joan Wasser and drummer Kevin March. Besides several singles, they have released an EP on SpinArt as well as their major label debut, Encendedor, on EastWest.

The most unique part of their sound is Wasser's violin. The Dambuilders may be the first successful pop group to employ a full–time violinist since Camper Van Beethoven. In concert, Wasser plays her instrument with as much energy as a heavy metal guitarist.

Their recent and most popular release, Encendedor, is mostly a collection of previously released songs. The first single "Shrine" was a popular track on MTV and college/ alternative radio. Other outstanding tracks on the album include "Smell" and "Colin's Heroes," both of which were previously available on a Pop Narcotic 7".

Although they are primarily a pop band, they don't sound like anyone else. SPIN described them as "easily the best indie–rock band in America that doesn't sound like Pavement or Dinosaur Jr." It is debatable whether this is true or not, but it is hard not to argue that they have a most unique sound.

Another intriguing aspect of this band is their attempt to write a song about each of the 50 states — an ambitious goal to say the least. So far they have written songs for "Delaware," "Pennsylvania," and about eight more. Although they are a mere 20 percent done with the project, the band is confident they can do it.

On Thursday night the Dambuilders will play selections from Encendedor as well as a few states.

Opening up for the show will be another Boston pop band, Fuzzy. Their recent album on Seed is a high quality effort and their single "Flashlight" is outstanding.

Dambuilders will play Pearl Street on Dec. 1. Tickets are $5 in advance, $7 at the door. Show starts at 8:30 p.m.

Sisters tackle family problems in Walker's black comedy

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

In an age of therapists and family counselors, playwright George F. Walker's Escape from Happiness weaves a tale today's audience is sure to relate to. Presented by the University of Massachusetts Department of Theater, the dark comedy opens tomorrow night in the Curtain Theater and will run through Dec. 10.

The play divulges the lives of three sisters who travel back to their childhood home to confront the skeletons in their closets.

This dysfunctional family seems to have its fair share of problems. From cheating husbands, drugs, private investigators and a domineering father, the sisters — Elizabeth (Marissa Matrone), Mary Ann (Robyn Broderick) and Gail (Amee Gray) — must face them all. The play also deals with the "coming out" of one of the sisters, and how they rest of the family copes with the news.

Two guest actors, UMass professor emeritus Harry Mahnken and Dee Waterman of Amherst, will add their talent to the cast. Mahnken has worked with the New York Quaigh Theater and the Atlantic Theater Festival in New Jersey. Waterman has worked with community and college theater for a number of years and is an Amherst real estate agent. Both also have experience with The Hampshire Shakespeare Company.

Escape From Happiness is being directed by Professor Edward Golden, who also directed the Curtain Theater production of Playboy of the Western World, which won the national collegiate competition at the American Theater Festival (ACTF).

The UMass theater department plans to enter Escape From Happiness into this year's ACTF competition. There are three steps the play must go through before the ACTF, according to Lisa Danforth, spokesperson for the UMass Theater Department.

The performance will first be viewed at the show's original space by regional judges. If they make the regional cut, the cast and a smaller crew will be invited to participate in a regional competition.

There, awards including best actor and best set will be given and one play will be selected to participate in the national competition which will be held again in Washington, D.C. at the Kennedy Center.

Escape From Happiness will be performed Nov. 30 through Dec. 3 and Dec. 6 through Dec. 10 at 8 p.m. in the Curtain Theater. An additional matinee performance is scheduled for Dec. 3 at 2 p.m.

Tickets for Escape From Happiness are $6 general; $5 50 students and seniors. Advanced reservations are strongly recommended. For more information call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545–2511

Black conference in Maryland, UMass students attend

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

Last week, 28 Black University of Massachusetts students trekked to Maryland to meet with others sharing a common goal.

From Nov. 17 to Nov. 20, over 2,000 Blacks attended the ambitious Baltimore gathering entitled "The National State of the Race Conference." The event was intended to help tackle some of the more pressing topics on the collective mind of the Black community in the United States, such as leadership, women's issues, student activities and, most importantly, organization.

A major goal for those involved was to network the geographically scattered people, many of whom could prove to be valuable friends or contacts in the near future.

Thursday commenced with an event called "Founders' Fair," where Blacks who had created grassroots organizations spoke with students on how to start similarly successful projects.

The day continued with a town meeting featuring UMass professor William Strickland, who teaches history in the Afro-American studies department. Many took advantage of the open forum to vent their opinions and listen to opposing viewpoints.

The low point of the conference, according to many, arrived in the form of the "Student Caucus" activity on Friday evening. Before any of the major concepts to be discussed were ever revealed, a Black audience member alerted the group to the presence of three White students in the room; the individual suggested that the Whites should exit due to the sensitive nature of the ideas to be presented in the caucus.

Soon, the room erupted in a hailstorm of heated discussion over whether or not the Whites should stay. A vote was offered as a solution, but was discarded by organizers who said they feared the legal ramifications of such a discriminatory action.

Many of the Black high school students did not mind involvement of Whites in the event, which ended after nearly 45 minutes of debate without any of the five ideas being shared. It was primarily collegians who wanted the three gone.

Although the Student Caucus may have exploded without resolution, students attending said the International Caucus shone as a sharp intellectual forum. The focus of the five multicultural speakers was the ongoing domination of the world economy by Western powers, whose interests have shifted from political and economic control to solely the latter aspect.

The final day, Saturday, was highlighted by "Black Youth in Crisis," a workshop at which Muslim speaker Erie Mohammed quickly became the center of attention. Mohammed attacked many American conventions which he believes have led to a state of decadence within the Black community. "Television," as he dubbed it, was one such factor.

The UMass students in attendance were mixed in their overall opinions of the effectiveness of the conference.

Senior Dolly Fernandez said that, for the most part, there was more rhetoric than solutions with the exception of one student she heard, who offered realistic and practical advice on forming a neighborhood community as a cohesive whole.

"We learned what kind of power, motivation and energy have as long as we don't get caught up in B.S.," Fernandez said.

"It was informative both inside and outside of the conference classrooms," said sophomore Leona Walker. "Every experience is a learning experience and so I was overwhelmed and touched by the amount of networking. There were a number of positive Black students and professionals were very generous."

Non-traditional views of Tony Martin should not be overlooked

Chris Conner

The true danger, people must realize, would lie in not allowing him to speak.

Essentially, Tony Martin, controversial Wellesley professor, is your quintessential Madison Avenue adman, much like anyone who presents so-called "carefully researched" sociological material. He knows that the product must be sold, and sold hard, at that.

Much popular sociology, like any other science or advertisement, is inexact, and therefore must sometimes slap the reader or viewer in the face with the heavy glove of exaggeration. We find ourselves insulted and, as calculated by those who produce the material, we remember what we saw.

Quite obviously, some of what he says is about solid as a soap bubble if one really takes a close look; yet many Martin opponents instead choose to attack the man and not the actual texts.

However, this will probably not be the case in the week to come. Last semester's Louis Farrakhan furor certainly indicates that Martin will be met with the same sort of opponents who open their mouths with only a peripheral understanding of that which they're protesting.

These people are the types who bashed Ice-T's "Cop Killer," failing to comprehend that the song's narrator might be a characterization. Is there anyone who truly believed that Bob Marley really shot the sheriff?

Accordingly, in the case of Tony Martin, those who question the meaning and/or meaning of his literature need to stop and think for a while. If Martin were a true bigot, surely he would be smiling knowing that the bigot's secret tactic was in full effect.

The tactic: Infuriate, divide and conquer.

Take, for example, any statement considered offensive made by an individual towards a specific community. Inevitably, many people become angered although some non-members of the "assaulted" group will take action, most likely the most organized opposition will come from the community.

Because the issue at hand is deeply personal, there will be different reactions from different factions within the community. Often, since not everyone can agree on a common solution, sub-groups are formed from a split of opinions. A sub-group obviously does not have the power of the whole group and thus does not have the strength to level the racist's foundation.

However, Tony Martin is not a true bigot.

In a March 1993 newsletter, he said that "any rapprochement between African Americans and Jews will have to be predicated on mutual respect." A true bigot would neither offer any compromise nor offer "respect" to any group believed to be inferior.

Perhaps, in his own justifiably misinterpreted way, Martin is trying to open up some avenue of communication.

Yet because some of the professor's comments are undeniably questionable in their factual content, there will be people who can rightfully contest that he is just misunderstood. The two most important things for these opponents and proponents of Martin to remember will be to know their facts and to listen to each other and respond, not retort.

Wilma Rudolph — an appreciation

Wilma Rudolph wasn't just the fastest woman of her time. She ranks among the most heroic of Americans.

She triumphed not only on the track with three Olympic gold medals but also against the childhood diseases that doctors had said would cripple her for life.

Baby boomers reared in the '60s on the stories of Wilma Rudolph's determination were surprised to learn of her recent death from brain cancer at the age of 54. She was such a fighter that it is hard to believe she could succumb to any disease.

Rudolph weighed just four pounds at birth. At age four, she had double pneumonia and scarlet fever. Later, she had polio. Her left leg was paralyzed. Her siblings and parents took turns massaging the leg, and her mother drove her to a faraway hospital every week for treatment. She walked first with a leg brace and then with a special shoe until the day her mother found her playing basketball barefoot at age 11.

At 16, she won a bronze medal in a relay race at the 1956 Games in Melbourne, Australia. Four years later, in Rome, she became the first woman to win three gold medals in track and field at an Olympics, and she set track records as well.

That was a time when Olympians could not profit financially from their talents. She left sports before her prime to earn a living in business, and she helped youngsters overcome obstacles through the Wilma Rudolph Foundation.

The current generation of fleet-footed female champions name her as their greatest influence. But her influence goes far beyond the track.

Hartford Courant

The current generation of fleet-footed female champions name her as their greatest influence. But her influence goes far beyond the track. Like Jesse Owens, the other legendary athlete she is often compared with, she embodied American ideals of pluck and grace. She was an inspiration to everyone.

UMass takes first-ever No. 1 rank

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

For the first time ever, the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will look down from the top of the hill.

When the Associated Press poll was released yesterday afternoon Massachusetts, received 58 of the 65 possible first place votes to make them the No. 1 team in the nation for the first time ever. After routing previously No. 1 Arkansas 104-80 last Friday the No. 3 Minutemen leapfrogged North Carolina into the top spot. UMass is now the consensus No. 1 after earning the top spot in the USA Today/CNN Coaches poll released Sunday night.

> "It makes the bulls–eye on our back that much bigger," Calipari said. "It's more hype at this time of year than anything else. It probably does more to help our opponent."

North Carolina remained at No. 2 in the AP poll after narrowly defeating Texas. The Tar Heels received six first place votes. Kentucky received the other first place vote.

Arkansas, who improved their record to 1–1 with a win over Georgetown, fell three spots to No. 4.

This is the first time ever that a University of Massachusetts team has ever been ranked No. 1 nationally in any sport.

"It's amazing, and that's great," said Massachusetts Coach John Calipari. "But it's not about now and this week. We're gearing for the whole season."

While he is pleased by the victory over Arkansas, Calipari is concerned by the negatives that can come with the exultation.

"It makes the bulls–eye on our back that much bigger," Calipari said. "It's more hype at this time of year than anything else. It probably does more to help our opponent than anything else.

"The point is we were willing to play the national champion early on in the season and we got lucky and beat them."

Despite Calipari's reservations about the obvious hype, several other people with considerable interest in the program were pleased by the ranking.

Massachusetts Athletic Director Bob Marcum said that the effects could have positive effects throughout the athletic department.

"The result is nationwide publicity and exposure. I guarantee that if any of our coaches in their respective sports called one of their recruits after the Arkansas game, [the recruit] would have known about UMass," Marcum said. "It's a credit to John's hard work and the dedication of the players."

In a year, many consider a down year for the conference, Atlantic 10 Commissioner Linda Bruno was pleased with the recognition being received by its marquee team.

"When you have a school ranked No. 1, there is obvious prestige for the conference," Bruno said. "There will be a lot of pressure on John [Calipari] in the next few weeks, but we're enjoying it down here."

The Minutemen are the first Atlantic 10 team to be ranked in the top spot since 1988. Temple was ranked No. 1 throughout most of the 1987–88 season. The Owls entered the NCAA tournament as the No. 1 seed, advancing to the Final Eight before falling to Duke.

PAUL BILODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Coach John Calipari's Minutemen became the first University of Massachusetts team ever to be picked No. 1 in the nation yesterday.

After watching his team fall from the top spot after the loss to UMass, Arkansas Coach Nolan Richardson reflected on the importance of No. 1.

"It's a number that doesn't really mean anything until April," Richardson said. "But it does build a lot of prestige for your school and the recruitment of athletes."

The Minutemen will get their first chance to defend their No. 1 ranking when they play the No. 7 Kansas Jayhawks at the John Wooden Classic at the Pond in Anaheim, Calif. on Saturday. UMass fell to Kansas last year in the finals of the Preseason NIT.

With the increased hype of being No. 1, Calipari is trying to keep things in perspective for his team.

"I think the team understands that it is early," Calipari said. "We practiced this morning and they were good. We've got to play Kansas on Saturday and that's what we're focusing on now."

Water polo ends season with losses at NCAAs

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

This weekend at the NCAAs in Long Beach, Ca., the No. 10 ranked University of Massachusetts men's water polo team finished a record-breaking season with a disappointing eighth place finish.

With consecutive losses to Cal–Berkeley (12–7), Navy (11–3) and the Air Force Academy (7–5), the squad was not able to capitalize on their dominant offense, led by single season and career point leader senior co–captain Javier Gonzalez, and a 30–6 record.

> "Making the NCAAs is the pinnacle of achievement for any college team. We were thrilled to get there, and on Friday we probably played the best game of our lives against Cal–Berkeley."

The Belmont Plaza pool was the setting for the showdown of the best teams in the nation, and UMass came up just shy all weekend long — especially in their hard–fought first round match Friday afternoon with the Golden Bears of the University of California–Berkeley.

Looking to make history as the first East Coast team to reach the Final Four, the Minutemen faced off against this familiar West Coast adversary. After the previous two blowout matches in the last year (17–4 in last year's NCAAs and 20–3 at the Labor Day Invitational this season), defense was the key word in this upset attempt. They held the perennial top 10 power in check for the whole game, but the Golden Bears ended up to be too much in a close 12–7 defeat.

"Making the NCAAs is the pinnacle of achievement for any college team. We were thrilled to get there, and on Friday we probably played the best game of our lives against Cal–Berkeley," said Massachusetts Coach Russ Yarworth.

"We had them scared, we were never ahead of them, but we had them in trouble. We had a real opportunity to make water polo history, and we played our hearts out. The thing that let us down is we weren't able to convert our man–up [0 for 7]."

UMass drew within two goals at the 5:39 mark of the third quarter with a tally from Gonzalez (3 goals in the game, 117 for the season), making the score a close 6–4 margin. But then a four–goal run by Cal–Berkeley and a five–goal final quarter put the contest out of reach. Even with a two–point goal by sophomore Greg Menton (53 goals, 87 points) at 2:06 of the fourth quarter, the quest for a national championship fell short.

"The guys really believed that they could beat Cal and they had a lot of people in the building thinking that," Yarworth said. "You give yourself opportunities to win and that is a great feeling in itself. We gained a lot of respect nationally but I think it took everything out of us. The rest of the weekend we were just flat, we just didn't play well."

The consolation rounds began with another familiar opponent, the Naval Academy. The two East Coast powerhouses split their two meets this season, with the more important matchup won by the Minutemen in the Eastern Championships (9–6, at Brown University), which resulted in the automatic bid for the NCAAs. Navy came in looking for revenge on UMass, and this was the perfect opportunity.

The falloff of sustained concentration from such a exhausting and emotionally deflating experience the day before resulted in a somewhat lopsided, uninspired performance in a 11–3 loss. Led by Doug Munz' five goals, Navy got what they wanted.

The Minutemen were not able to recapture the defensive strategy that held him and his team in the second half of the Eastern Championship game, and coupled with the effect of the first round loss, the final score told the story.

"I'm really proud of the guys, but I'm also disappointed that we could not rally after that [loss against Cal–Berkeley]. That often times happens in championships, once you go into the consolation bracket, its tough to motivate," Yarworth said.

"Plus, Navy was lying there like a snake in the grass. They lost to us in Easterns, and lost their whole motivation for Nationals. We went from playing our best game of the year to probably our worst game. It wasn't because the kids weren't trying — they just weren't able to put it together."

The final match of the weekend against the Air Force Academy once again was plagued by the inconsistencies of shooting percentage and the apparent loss of the mental edge. These two squads also split their regular season matches and unfamiliarity with each others' strengths and weaknesses was not a factor. Both earlier contests were decided by no more than two goals, and this one was no different, but with a Air Force win of 7–5.

"That was a weird game. We came out and went up 3–0 in the first, then we didn't stop playing but just stopped doing things well," Yarworth said. "The first quarter our shots went in, we went 3 for 6, that is what you want. Then the rest of the game the ball didn't go in the net — we shot 5 for 23. It was a frustrating feeling."

"That was a very lofty goal [win in 1st round], but it was one we wanted to achieve. We had 30 wins this year, and no one in the country had 30 wins. We made NCAAs, and were Eastern Champs two years in a row. No one can take that away from us."

Volleyball extends season with NIVC bid

By Brian Perillo

It's not over yet.

The University of Massachusetts women's volleyball team will continue its successful season this weekend as they enter the National Invitational Volleyball Championships in Kansas City, Miss.

The Minutewomen, who stand at 26–5 on the season after advancing to the semi–finals of the Atlantic–10 tournament two weekends ago, were offered a bid to the NIVC, where they will compete as one of 20 other teams in a pool playoff format.

"We're pretty excited," said Massachusetts Coach Bonnie Kenny. "I thought we had a good shot, and I would have been disappointed if we didn't get in."

COLLEGIAN FILE

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team had their season extended when they received a bid to the National Invitational Volleyball Championships.

The NIVC will divide the participants into four pools of five teams each. Each team will play a total of four matches, one against each school in its group in round robin format. The member of each pool with the best record will advance to a semi–final round on Sunday and those winners will play in the NIVC final, also on Sunday.

The Minutewomen will be grouped in pool C with Fresno State, Idaho State, Arkansas and Iowa State.

"We're in a tough pool," Kenny said. "It's a great challenge for us."

UMass tangles with Fresno State on Friday morning at 9 a.m., before meeting Idaho State in the afternoon. On Saturday they will face Arkansas in the morning and Iowa State at 2 p.m. The semi–finals will be Sunday at 10 a.m., with the finals to follow at 2 p.m.

"We've been practicing all along since we got back from the Atlantic 10s," Kenny said.

UMass will have a chance to face teams from across the nation. They are the only A–10 team competing in the NIVC, (George Washington will participate in the NCAA tournament) and will be joined by Connecticut and Delaware as the only squads from the Northeast.

The Minutewomen's competition are following up some successful seasons themselves. Arkansas has a 17–15 record and Iowa State brings in a Mideast Regional ranking of 11 and a 20–10 record. Idaho State (18–9) has a No. 8 ranking in the Northwest Region, and Fresno State stands at 18–12.

"Fresno State is a good young team from the WAC," Kenny said. "They have some big wins over some good teams. They are used to playing big games."

The Minutewomen will be making their first post season appearance since 1980 when the team advanced to the second round of the EAIAW tournament. UMass, which will host the NCAA tournament in the William D. Mullins Center next year, will be making their first ever appearance in the NIVC.

With wins over top teams in '93 and '94, the debate rages: Which was bigger?

• Tip Off victory shines through as Massachusetts' best win

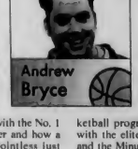
With 1:35 left to go in No. 3 Massachusetts' shocking 104–80 rout of No. 1 Arkansas in the Tip Off Classic, most of the Springfield Civic Center capacity crowd of 8,999 began the chant, "We're No. 1."

Those fans were right on the mark.

As a result of the drubbing of the NCAA defending champions, Massachusetts sits atop both the USA Today/CNN Coaches' poll and the Associated Press poll.

Plain and simple, that is the main reason why the Minutemen's win against Arkansas last Friday was bigger than last year's fellow shocker against then No. 1 North Carolina in the Preseason NIT Tournament, 91–86. After No. 18 Massachusetts defeated the NCAA defending champion Tar Heels in overtime on Nov. 24, 1993, it jumped into the Top 10 for the first time in school history, grabbing the No. 9 spot.



Andrew Bryce

It was indeed a nice rise in the rankings, moving up nine spots after the huge win. In order for a program to enter the upper echelon of college basketball, baby steps must be taken. Cracking the Top 10 and beating a team like Carolina that has a prestigious history was a definite step in the right direction.

Now, the Minutemen have leapt forward with the No. 1 ranking. The BS of how it is only November and how a regular early–in–the–season ranking is pointless just doesn't cut it with me. What is a team's goal? To be the best. Doesn't the best mean being No. 1? For all intents and purposes, yes it does. The top ranking must be earned, and third–ranked Massachusetts beat the best. So, for the time being, Massachusetts is the best team in America.

Another difference between the Arkansas beating and the close Carolina win was just that — the Minutemen needed a three–pointer from Mike Williams to put the game into overtime and give them another chance for victory. No need for a clutch shot in the Arkansas game as Massachusetts absolutely spanked them from start to finish. The Razorbacks led once — 4–2 quite early in the first half.

Speaking of Williams, Massachusetts' 24–point blowout was done without the services of the preseason Second Team All–Atlantic 10 member. Williams was sitting out the final game of his three–game suspension imposed by Coach John Calipari due to team academic regulations.

The absence of Williams meant that the Minutemen, though as deep as they were, were without one of their starters, a mainstay in the lineup the last two seasons. With Arkansas being a huge game, and with the Rutgers–George Washington–North Carolina–Temple–killer sitting it out, the Minutemen entered the game with a disability.

How 'bout adversity? The Massachusetts basketball program has been ridiculed, embarrassed and extensively criticized for the last month by media and fans alike in regards to the academic status of the team after the well– known Boston Globe article that included some of the players' GPAs.

As for the Minutemen, the Arkansas game was an example of how they were going to handle this whole problem on the court. The Minutemen were up–and–coming heading into the Carolina game. They wanted the headlines, they craved the print. Nowadays, the Massachusetts basketball program is targeted because they are mingling with the elite. Along with the glory comes adversity — and the Minutemen handled it well by staying focused in the Arkansas tilt.

Was the Carolina win big? Huge. Did it mean a great deal to the program? No doubt. But the win in Springfield last Friday came at as perfect timing as you can get in the first game of the season. It wasn't in a large tournament setting, nor was it played in the big city like the Carolina game. From Massachusetts' standpoint, the game didn't need it. There was enough outside influence to deal with.

With the victory, with the adversity, and without Williams, the result was oh–so–sweet for the Minutemen. The meaning of this win can be stated in one short sentence:

Massachusetts is the No. 1 team in the country.

Andrew Bryce is a Collegian columnist.

•Nothing could be finer than victory over North Carolina

Don't forget where you came from.

In all of the hoopla surrounding Massachusetts' victory over defending national champion and then–No. 1 Arkansas, many would like to put it in the history books as the program's biggest win ever.

I tend to disagree. No matter how huge the 104–80 thrashing of the Razorbacks is for the 1994–95 Minutemen, when you are talking about the rise of the University's men's basketball program under Coach John Calipari, the win over North Carolina is the one you want.

Yes, the Minutemen are No. 1 for the first time in the school's history and the Arkansas game is the reason why.

Arthur Stapleton Jr.

Being the No. 1 team in the nation in November isn't all too shocking for Massachusetts. It's more excitement than surprise. At the rate top–ranked teams are falling this season, Massachusetts may lose and then regain the top spot more than once.

With a loss to Kansas this Saturday, or in any game, for that matter, the stop at the top of the polls may be short– lived — and with it goes the importance of that one victory over Arkansas. The greatness of the win over the Hogs lasts until the Jayhawks. Then the Maryland Terrapins.

It is now equally important for the Minutemen to win as many big games as possible.

On the other hand, the Carolina triumph has the utmost importance in the rise of Massachusetts basketball. As far as rankings go, the Minutemen were just considered another team from the slightly improving Atlantic 10 Conference, which had yet to make mierowaves nationally.

Calipari was a heavy underdog against one of the greatest coaches of all–time, UNC's Dean Smith. The tradition of North Carolina runs pretty deep. From Blue Heaven to the Dean Dome to Michael Jordan, the Tar Heels are the epitome of college basketball.

And in the Miracle on 33rd St., Massachusetts buried that tradition. The young coach from Moon, Pa., and his feisty Minutemen sent shockwaves to Tobacco Road and the Tar Heel fans which packed Madison Square Garden.

The Big Apple — the media capital of the world. Meet Massachusetts. The win gave the Minutemen the respect of the nation and the New York media. It was more Massachusetts' win than Carolina's loss.

Friday's game was not in a major media market — It was in Springfield; in the Civic Center, not Madison Square Garden. Massachusetts had been on national television before, and many people who were watching ESPN's coverage of the Minutemen and the Razorbacks are already college hoop fans and respect Calipari's squad anyway.

As for the game itself, heading in, some people actually gave Massachusetts a chance against Arkansas, mainly because of talent and Its No. 3 ranking. Well, against the Tar Heels, no one gave the No. 18 Minutemen a chance.

The crowd in the Garden was pro–Tar Heels. Arkansas came to Massachusetts' backyard and left without Its No. 1 ranking.

In MSG, the Minutemen had to overcome adversity, namely the injury to Camby in the early minutes of overtime. Despite the absence of Mike Williams in the game against the Razorbacks, Massachusetts prevailed. Don't forget, though, that Calipari and his team prepared for Arkansas without Williams — they didn't have that option against Carolina.

So the debate rages on. The top–ranked Minutemen has a nice ring to it, and Calipari has the Razorbacks to thank for It. When one looks back on it, however, No. 1 Massachusetts probably would have never been in the Tip– Off Classic if the Minutemen didn't beat Carolina last year.

That win put them on the map — and at the top of the polls.

Little response to BSU demands

Meeting with Scott ends without change

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

Approximately 40 Black students met with Chancellor David K. Scott last night at Whitmore Administration Building to hear responses to a list of demands presented earlier this month.

Although there were only half the number of students attending as there were at the Nov. 2 meeting, this time Afro-American Studies Professor John Bracey and Office of Third World Affairs Director Nelson Acosta sat in to support the youths.

In the previous meeting, the demands were introduced to the nearly 70 students present protesting Springfield Union News reporter Brad Smith's having distributed the grades of Black student-athletes in a Media Criticism class.

At the conclusion of the discussion, Lizana gave Scott a deadline, Nov. 29, by which time solutions to the problems had to be prepared.

Scott made last evening's first remarks.

"I think it's important to meet more frequently on these issues," Scott said.

Black Student Union President Shomwa Shamapande opened by informing Scott that if the University were not seriously committed to change, then Black frustration might lead to "drastic measures to show our conviction."

At this point, Shamapande presented the Chancellor with the first demand, that Brad Smith be banned from the UMass campus.

Scott's response was that because there was no "menace or heinous crime" threatened by Smith, then there is no legal basis upon which to declare Smith a trespasser on campus.

Dan Lizana, vice president of the Black Student Union, poses a question to Chancellor Scott as BSU President Shomwa Shamapande listens during a heated meeting last night.

Debate raged as students claimed that psychological damage to Smith's victims constituted an actual crime. Scott admitted that the materials were "probably stolen," but speculated that the theft was an inside job; if that were the case, Smith would not legally be held accountable for the means by which his source gathered the grades due to the fact that he is a reporter.

The repair of the New Africa House was the next issue raised, sparking a more furious dialogue than the previous topic.

Scott said that the renovations, which according

World trade agreement welcomed by Clinton

By Martin Crutsinger
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House, brushing off critics who protested the legitimacy of a vote by a lame-duck Congress, passed a sweeping world trade agreement Tuesday. President Clinton hailed it as a "historic vote for American workers, farmers and families."

The House voted 288-146 for the rewrite of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, sending the measure to the Senate, where supporters were still searching for the votes needed for passage.

The four hours of debate were brought to a close by House Speaker Thomas Foley, who in his final speech in the chamber where he had served for 30 years urged his colleagues to pass the measure.

"It is impossible to imagine a single act of this Congress that can do more to contribute to our economic growth," said Foley, who was defeated in the November elections in a Republican sweep that gave control of both the House and the Senate to the GOP for the first time in 40 years.

Foley was one of 85 House members who were either defeated or chose not to seek re-election participating in the first lame-duck session of Congress in 12 years, a fact that GATT opponents pointed to often during the debate.

The GATT accord would cut tariffs by 38 percent worldwide, expand the rules of world trade to new areas such as agriculture and services and create a new, more powerful World Trade Organization to referee disputes.

The administration estimated that the reduced tariffs equate to a $744 billion global tax cut over a decade. For Americans, it would represent a $70 billion cut in border taxes on imported goods and services over 10 years.

Foley and other supporters argued that a defeat of the trade agreement would be disastrous for America's standing in the world. But opponents pleaded with equal fervor that the 124-nation GATT accord was too complex to be settled "on the 11th hour" by many lawmakers who had been voted out of office.

The 142-vote margin of passage represented a victory for President Clinton, who had worked the telephones throughout the day talking to undecided lawmakers.

It was the first post-election test of whether the White House and Republicans who will control Capitol Hill come January could work together.

U.S. is guilty of causing injury to immigrants

By William A. Davila

Editor's Note: This is the second in a four-part series.

Proposition 187, Section 1. "Findings and Declarations", claims that the people of California "have suffered and are suffering personal injury and damage caused by the criminal conduct of illegal aliens. . ." Yet, our very own criminal justice system has been accused of inflicting the same kind of "personal injury" on immigrants.

PROP 187
News Analysis

This land, the United States of America, protected by the government from "aliens," once belonged to another nation. "We must realize that California, and four other states, were originally part of Mexico," reads an opinion piece in La Sentinel. An article in the magazine Integrities, "Throwing Light On Immigration," explains how "the only truly 'legal' people in this country are probably the Native Americans."

As far as the indictment of "criminal conduct," the steps taken to confiscate the Mexican territories from its true owners between 1848 and 1853 constitute "criminal conduct" as far as International Law is concerned. According to a Voz Frontera article, "The Border," most "of the land was acquired by deceit, fraud and violence."

To this day the United States is still continually accused of oppressing and inflicting violence on immigrants. Immigration and Naturalization Services' Border Patrol agents have a long history of complaints for their disregard for the human rights of immigrants. Numerous incidents between Border Patrol agents and immigrants along the border exemplify this misconduct, and what some have called "cowardice," on the part of immigration officials here in the United States.

One example, noted in a Los Angeles Times article, "Possible Cover-Up Probed in Border Killing," includes a migrant worker by the name of Dario Miranda Valenzuela; Age 26, a family man with a pregnant wife and two children. He was shot twice in the back. Valenzuela was unarmed and, obviously, running away from the Border Patrol, towards Mexico. Attorneys for Valenzuela's family say that "Valenzuela may have been left to die." Maj. Ramon Arturo Romo of the Santa Cruz County Sheriff's Department confirmed that no medical attention was called by the U.S. agents.

The Valenzuela family claims that he was only trying to "find work to support his family" and better himself economically. They said he only wanted to realize the "American Dream" but instead, was confronted with a nightmare.

Another incident involves an innocent youth. In November 1990 a 15-year-old Mexican was shot by Border Patrol Agents. He was not on American land or running toward it or away from it. He was sitting on a fence that divided Calexico from Mexicali, Mexico. Agents claim the youth was "preparing to throw a rock at an agent." Witnesses, however, do not support the allegations and insist the attack was unprovoked.

As much as the border patrol has tried to portray these as isolated incidents, they are not. In an article

Kraft puts offer on the table for UM football

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

The New England Patriots may not be the only football team playing in Foxboro Stadium in years to come.

Robert Kraft, owner of the New England Patriots, has offered the uses of Foxboro Stadium to the UMass football team, free of charge.

Currently the University is investigating ways in which the football team can move from Division I-AA to Division I-A. The use of Foxboro Stadium would help UMass fulfill an NCAA D-IA attendance requirement for football.

For a school to have a D-IA football team, they must meet two requirements by NCAA ruling, according to Shirley Whitacre, NCAA membership coordinator.

"If a school has at least 30,000 seats or more in the stadium, they must average 17,000 people in attendance for one year during a four-year period," Whitacre said. "If they have fewer than 30,000 seats, the school must average 17,000 people in attendance in a four-year period."

Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium, where UMass currently plays, seats approximately 16,000.

According to Chancellor David K. Scott, if UMass wants to make the move to D-IA football, McGuirk Stadium must be expanded to seat more people, or a new stadium must be built.

"If the University wants to go to D-IA football, we need a 35,000-seat stadium," Scott said. "And we need to make sure that we fill 35,000 seats."

According to Scott, a committee of administrators, faculty, staff and students has been formed to evaluate the feasibility of having a D-IA football team, including the possibility of playing at Foxboro Stadium or upgrading McGuirk Stadium.

The committee, headed by Ron Story, vice chancellor for University relations and advancement, will review both the positives and the negatives of moving to D-IA football and report to the University, according to Scott.

"The committee will look at all aspects, including the effects on recruitment at the University, gender equity, revenues, etc.," Scott said. "They will make a report to me and I will then determine what proposal to make to the Board of Trustees and [UMass President Michael K.] Hooker."

One of the concerns of playing UMass football in Foxboro Stadium is the effects it would have on Western Massachusetts, according to Scott.

"The committee will look at the demographics of Western Massachusetts in terms of attending the football games," Scott said. "Wherever the football team is playing, you have to look at the feasibility of filling the stadium."

According to Scott, Kraft's offer of Foxboro Stadium does not affect the chances of the UMass Minutemen moving to D-IA football.

"It neither increases nor decreases the possibility of moving to D-IA football, it just adds another dimension for the University to explore," Scott said. "All it means is

Pride of UMass English department showcased at reading

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts English professors James Tate and John Edgar Wideman read some of their works to a full house yesterday at an English Department reception in Memorial Hall.

Tate won the National Book Award for poetry for his book, Worshipful Company of Fletchers (EccoPress). Wideman was nominated for the National Book award in the non-fiction category for Fatheralong: A Meditation on Fathers, Sons, Race and Society (Pantheon Books).

UMass is the first university ever to have two National Book Award nominations in a single department, according to Lee Edwards, dean of Humanities at the University.

Edwards, also a member of the English department, spoke of the achievements of the department, such as the articles, poems, and essays written by faculty, as well as the 6,000 students who were taught by the English department and the production of a book on CD-ROM about writing.

"The whole English Department gives the University cause for celebration," said Edwards.

Wideman read from a new untitled novel about a young, Black preacher in 18th century America. Wideman's first selection centered around the thoughts of the boy as he worried about the sick girl he was caring for. Wideman's second selection, momentarily titled Roe's Garden, was about the preacher's experiences with his church, an English preacher, discrimination, and what a man named Roe saw when he smiled at the sky.

Wideman joined the University in 1986 and has written over 12 novels including A Glance Away (1967), Dumbaliah (1981), and Reuben (1987). A Washington Post review of Reuben referred to Wideman as "one of the half-dozen leading black novelists alive today."

Wideman has won over seven literary awards, including the MacArther Award and the St. Rotolph Literary Award, both won in 1993.

"Wideman is at it again," said Tate over the applauding audience when Wideman finished his reading.

Wideman was also one of two Black students to receive Rhodes scholarships in 1963 — the first since Alian Locke in 1907.

Tate described the National Book Award ceremony as "a fairly glamorous event down there in New York City."

He read some of his popular poetic works, including "Ilan in Retirement," "50 Views of Tokyo," "The New Work," "Worshipful Company of Fletchers," and "Happy as the Day is Long."

Tate went on to some unpublished poetic works, including "Non-stop," "A Sleeping Disorder Tour," and "Dream On." The audience, listening intently during Wideman's reading, constantly laughed at the puns and humor in Tate's poetry. When asked why he ended his poem, "I Left My Couch in Tatamaguteh" with the famous closing Robert Frost used in "The Road not Taken", and that has made all the difference, Tate said, "It was a joke."

Tate has been with the University since 1971. He won the Pulitzer Prize for his Selected Poems, which was published in 1991. The Lost Pilot, his first volume of poetry, won the Yale Series of Younger Poets Award in 1967. Some of his books include Hints to Pilgrims (1971), Constant Defender (1983), and Distance From

Stocks end mixed, bond prices drop

NEW YORK (AP) — The stock market ended mixed today as bond prices tumbled following some better-than-expected news on the economy.

The Conference Board said consumer confidence in the economy rose sharply in November to reach a four-year high, with more households optimistic about jobs and income. The business-research group's Consumer Confidence Index climbed last month to 101.3, up from a revised 89.1 reading in October.

Bond prices tumbled, with the yield on the Treasury's benchmark 30-year bond moving back above the key 8 percent level.

Bond investors don't like word of strong economic growth because that implies inflation down the road. Inflation erodes the value of fixed-income securities such as Treasuries.

UMass astrology dept. building in Mexico

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

There will be other reasons, aside from spring break, for University of Massachusetts students to go south in upcoming years.

Mexico is the predicted sight of future southern excursions, involving sun, fun and astrology.

The UMass astrology department is in the beginning stages of designing a new, highly-advanced telescope stationed in Mexico, according to Dr. William Irvine, UMass astrology professor and director of the Five College Radio Astronomy Observatory at the Quabbin Reservoir.

"When it's built, it'll be the largest telescope of its kind in the world," Irvine said.

Components of the telescope will be built and tested separately over the next several years. Students will have the opportunity to partake in this building process, according to Art Clifford, the editor of Science Notes.

"They'll be building computers, receivers and antennas," Clifford said. "It's like building a very large stereo system."

The telescope will be used to observe radio waves that are produced by natural processes, Irvine said.

New stars form from cold matter, but this cold matter can not be seen at optical wavelengths, Irvine said. This telescope will make it possible to view cold matter.

The dish, where the mirror is located within the telescope, will measure at 165 feet across, Irvine said. It will consist of 126 units in the shape of hexagons. These hexagons will be computer-controlled to get the kind of precision necessary to view radio waves.

"Otherwise gravity would distort it," Irvine said. "That can be corrected through computers, by having the computer measure it when it distorts, and calculate the warping."

The telescope will be designed in the United States and transported to Mexico. The site and location in Mexico have not been determined yet, Irvine said.

Mexico was chosen partly because of its location in the southern hemisphere, Irvine said.

"The farther south you go, the better view you get of the southern sky," Irvine said. "The center of the Milky Way Galaxy can only be seen from the southern sky."

The telescope will have to be placed at a high, dry sight, which is why Mexico is the ideal location, Irvine said.

"It's too wet in Massachusetts," Irvine said. "The water vapor absorbs the signals."

The money has come through and marked the beginning of the project, Irvine said. It should take about five years to build.

This program could lead to an increase in relations with Mexico, Irvine said. It may even result in an influx of exchange programs between UMass and Mexico.

"We already have a number of Mexican students in the astronomy and engineering departments at UMass," Irvine said.

UMass had previously built a similar telescope, which was considered the largest in the world, and was later superseded by Europe and Japan.

"We wanted to get back into the forefront," Irvine said.

While seeking a slippery salmon on the Alaskan ship, J.D. stumbled overboard. After days of fruitless searching, J.D.'s pal, Colby, decided to place an ad in the Collegian Classifieds under Lost & Found to locate his dear friend. Just one week later a nice woman from a far off inland reported that she had found J.D. washed upon the shore one moonlit evening. Events to focus on AIDS awareness

'Born to be Alive' among the various programs to occur during

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

More than a decade into the AIDS crisis, people around the world are still struggling against what seems to be an unstoppable virus. As more and more people die and become infected, it is becoming apparent that until there is a cure, the only way to stop it is by changing people's behavior.

In commemoration of World AIDS day this Thursday, University Health Services Health Education Division and the Program for GLB Concerns are banding together to promote AIDS awareness and spur action on the part of students and local people.

"Are We Surviving?"

Events will take place over the course of eight days, beginning tonight with "Are We Surviving?" a program designed as a town meeting on the HIV/AIDS epidemic. The program is specifically geared for the Pioneer Valley gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender community.

This meeting will be led by a panel of AIDS activists, including Tim Hack (AIDS Action – Boston), Derek Link (Gay Men's Health Crisis – NYC) and Laurie Turkovsky (UHS Health Education Division, UMass).

The discussion will examine issues related to safer sex in the GLB community and newer safer sex prevention efforts aimed at helping HIV individuals remain negative. The "Safe Sex Is Hot Sex" campaign seemed to be going well for a while, but a recent rise in the HIV infection rate for GLBTs is raising calls for a new campaign. Activists are now trying to plan a campaign that will capture the attention of those who still do not believe they are at risk.

"Are We Surviving?" will take place tonight in Campus Center Room 165 from 6–8 p.m.

World AIDS Day

Tomorrow, World AIDS Day, UHS and the Program will be sponsoring a candlelight vigil beginning at 6:30 p.m. on the steps of the Student Union. People of all kinds are encouraged to show their support for the fight against AIDS/HIV — and their support for each other.

Participants are asked to bring their own candles for the walk, which will take them around campus and back to the Student Union. Speeches and other activities will follow in the Cape Cod Lounge.

On Dec. 1 and 2, there will be a safer sex table set up on the Campus Center Concourse. Those interested in information on safer sex will have access to free pamphlets and the advice of AIDS educators. The table will be set up from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. on both days.

University Health Services is sponsoring an ongoing exhibit entitled "Beyond The Names" that displays panels from the AIDS quilt. The exhibit continues at UHS through December.

"Born To Be Alive"

In the final event marking World AIDS Day, UHS and the Program for GLB Concerns will offer a workshop for the GLBT community. "Born To Be Alive" is designed to help GLBTs learn current and accurate safer sex information, including "new ways to make safer sex erotic, enjoyable, and healthy."

Participants are assured a safe, confidential space to talk honestly about sex and the reasons why people sometimes are not as safe as they should be.

"Born To Be Alive" will take place Dec. 7 in Campus Center Rooms 905 and 917 from 7–9 p.m.

Women's conference to tackle wide range of issues on Saturday

By Kate Moran
Special to the Collegian

Editor's Note: This is one in a three part series examining issues which will be presented at the upcoming women's conference on Saturday.

Last year, the U.S. press gave coverage to the plight of the Korean, Filipina and other Asian women held in "Comfort Stations" or rape camps by the Japanese government. After 50 years, these women sued the Japanese government and those who survived the experience of the camps. In subsequent years, they will receive some financial compensation.

The image of the evil Asians setting up sexual slavery has been widely publicized. The phrase "Shanghaied" comes from movies where the "innocent white heroine was kidnapped and swept away."

News Analysis

But in the last 50 years, the U.S. military has transformed the Villages of Olongapo and Angeles in the Philippines into "recreation centers" for the soldiers at Clark Air Force Base and Subic Bay Naval Station.

Fifty-five thousand women were "employed" by the U. S. military personnel and business men. Allegedly, these men pimped the women, giving them a very small percentage of what the soldiers paid for them and then charged them huge sums for rent, food and other essentials.

In the Nov/Dec '93 issue of Ms. magazine, there is the story of Pascual, who worked 24 hours a day when the ships were in, not able to sleep without being robbed by tricks. She'd make barely enough to live through the weeks without the ships. She had to pawn her bed whenever she needed an abortion.

In the Philippines, abortion is illegal, expensive and potentially fatal. At least 50,000 Amerasian children have been born since the U.S. came to the Philippines in 1944. These children have grown up in the same poverty their mothers faced and therefore a second generation has had no option but to take their mother's places.

Since the AIDS epidemic, soldiers and businessmen have increasingly demanded younger and younger children, believing that they would be less likely to have AIDS. Ian Raymond said at a talk on campus earlier this semester that girls between the ages of three and five are now in demand.

As the AIDS epidemic increased, the Navy registered all the women in Olongapo and gave them "sexual health IDs" that they had to carry with them at all times and produce when ever military personnel demanded them. Yet the military would only monitor them for AIDS. Once the women were diagnosed they were on their own. Many women in Southeast Asia have contracted AIDS and died working in the sex industry.

Raymond spoke of prostitutes in Thailand who were injected with eyanide and HIV positive prostitutes being deported and murdered at sea. Often unprotected intercourse can be the only way to economic survival in some areas and once a woman can no longer serve the interests of the pimps they are disposable. There are almost no ways out of the "entertainment industry" in the areas around the military bases.

In 1984, GABRIELA, a coalition of 100 different women's groups was founded to combat the military sex industry and the growing problem of sex tourism. GABRIELA did succeed in pressuring the Philippine senate to deny a new lease to the U.S. for the land that Subic Bay Naval Station was using. In addition to this, Clark Air Force Base was closed due to U.S. defense budget cuts.

Both the former Philippine government of Aquino and now the Ramos government have done little service to the economic needs of the women in these areas. GABRIELA continues to lobby and work to create economic alternatives for women in this area and other areas in Southeast Asia where the sex industry has enslaved women.

Feminists in the U.S. have been working to bring information on sexual exploitation by the U. S. military and corporations for years. Both Jean Grossholtz of Mount Holyoke College and Raymond are part of international feminist networks concerned with these issues.

Filippina feminist Ninotchka Rosca, one of the founders of GABRIELA, is scheduled to give one of the keynote addresses at this year's conference. She will be speaking this Saturday at 10 a.m. in the Campus Center. Her address will be entitled, "Trafficking and the International Division of Labor." The conference is free and pre-registration is not required.

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

Professor John Edgar Wideman read from some of his unpublished works at a reception honoring him and fellow English professor at the University, James Tate.

Loved Ones (1990).

"Nobody does it better," said Wideman in honor of Tate before Wideman started reading.

Between teaching assignments and thanks to various fellowships, he has lived in Ireland, Sweden, Spain and South Carolina.

"I thought it was really hilarious," said Carin Crasnick, a freshman journalism major, after listening to Tate's poetry.

"Intriguing and inspiring" was how Danny Armbruster, a freshman geology major, described the readings.

Both Tate and Wideman said they enjoyed the evening and thought the audience was responsive.

'Tire bill' to be proposed for next year

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

State Senator Stan Rosenberg (D–Amherst) is proposing a bill to relieve the growing problem of tire stockpiles around the state.

According to the Department of Environmental Protection (DEP), Massachusetts currently has 10–20 million tires in stockpile, many of which are illegal.

The "tire bill" would set up funding to be used by the DEP for tire removal projects, and recycling. Funding would also be used to remove tire dump sites, according to a press release from Rosenberg's office.

The funding would come from a tentative fee of $8, applied when a car is initially registered.

"Nobody likes to pay more," said Rosenberg. "But if they see the money is going to a specific purpose, they are more generous to the cause."

According to Steve Long, a legislative aid to Rosenberg, the fee was based on a national study of states by the North East Waste Management Officials Associations, that already have a similar type of tire recycling.

Currently 33 states have a way for tire abatement, while 14, including Massachusetts, do not.

"We've been behind in recycling all along," said Rosenberg. "For the past five years we've been focusing on homeowner recycling, now we're looking at corporate recycling and the tire problem."

Currently tires disposed of are shredded before land filled, others are sent to Maine or Connecticut to be burned for fuel, said Tom Mitchell, a legislative aid to Rosenberg.

Mitchell said Rosenberg would like to create a situation where the stockpiles can be reduced and the tires can be recycled.

The biggest health hazard for tire stockpiles are rats, mosquitoes and fires.

"It's time to take on this problem," said Rosenberg. "The public health and environmental risks are too great."

The bill would also call for tire stockpile regulations set for a person who has more than 500 tires. Regulations would include rules on pile height, distance between piles, and fire and mosquito regulations.

A permit of not more than $250 would have to be obtained from the DEP if a person has over 500 tires. Businesses and people using tires for agricultural reasons would be excluded.

Rosenberg said the tire bill is being proposed for next year.

Opinion/Editorial

Campus lacks leadership

Chancellor David K. Scott is concerned about "controversial" speakers, among other pressing issues.

Conventional wisdom deems "controversial" some speakers who have recently graced our campus with their presence: Minister Farrakhan (twice), Al Sharpton and Professor Leonard Jeffries. Note that conventional wisdom tends to find controversy in Black leaders.

A new name is to be added to the list: Dr. Tony Martin, professor of Africana studies at Wellesley College. He promises to be among the most brilliant, enlightening and, yes, controversial of them all. And Scott is concerned.

The question confronting the Chancellor is whether the University should remain open to this kind of free expression, or enact restrictions. Reports indicate that some campus groups have been actively pursuing a policy that would restrict controversial or "despicable" speakers at UMass.

Other groups have been calling for a statement by the University affirming free speech rights.

The Chancellor has dithered and has failed to provide leadership on this issue. He has allowed the creation of an impression that UMass is about to enact policies damaging the rights of students, faculty and guests, in the same way that he allowed the impression that UMass is a school where the transcripts of Black athletes are routinely passed out in classes. His handling of the transcripts scandal was so poor that a large group of Black students walked out of a meeting with him on the subject with their hands cupped over their ears.

In the wake of the defeat of No. 1 ranked Arkansas by the Minutemen, the Chancellor has been forced to admit that he has been tracking our athletes according to race and gender, a practice which led directly to the transcripts scandal. He sought to cover up by saying that such tracking was required by the NCAA; but this was also a lie.

The truth is that Scott, whose British accent does him little good, is proving a colossal failure in leading the campus on these vital and sensitive issues. Instead, his blunders have only served to make matters worse, time and again. A recent letter distributed and widely signed among faculty members criticizing the direction in which the Chancellor is leading the University is testimony to the growing lack of support he faces on campus.

President Hooker recently gave the UMass Amherst campus a lowly "C+" grade as a performance evaluation. It is impossible not to see this as a serious warning to Chancellor Scott that his performance is not being seen as adequate by his superiors.

Many on campus would agree. When the Chancellor does speak of his vision for the future, he generally lapses into some incomprehensible rubbish about creating a "transversity."

Juan Jose Chacon Quiros de Quetzalcoatl

Although no one is really sure what on earth he could mean by this concept, Scott persists in raising the idea in most large meetings.

Another sign of the doubts that plague the Scott regime is the recent release of a report by a right-wing group of scholars criticizing the multiculturalism and diversity programs at UMass. More than anything else, it indicates that UMass–Amherst is seen as vulnerable to political criticism in part due to the weak and ineffectual leadership.

Furthermore, as the campus infrastructure crumbles around us all, Scott has been making enough money to fill the Chancellor's mansion with valuable European antiques. Meanwhile, all the Chancellor can manage to say in the face of the growing criticisms is "I maintain that we do a very credible job."

Many of us on campus are tired of listening to this man and his endless and weak excuses. We will be glad, therefore, of the chance to see and listen to, in Bowker Auditorium on Dec. 6, a very courageous and brilliant scholar — Dr. Tony Martin. His talk, however controversial it may be, will almost certainly stand in stark contrast to the spineless Chancellor Scott.

A different kind of holiday

"What is this?" she asked with a look of disgust.

"It's the neck," my housemate responded laughing.

"It doesn't look like a neck, it looks like a shriveled —"

We were cleaning the turkey for our own Amherst Thanksgiving dinner. Long after shrills of disgust, analogies to anatomy and laughter at the entire production — a turkey had been stuffed and placed in the oven with a degree of surprising success. Throughout the afternoon, the kitchen filled with the seasonal scents of a roasting turkey, stuffing, cranberries, candied yams and other various vegetables, all seducing us into a ravenous impatience.

By 8 p.m. I found myself seated at a feast fit for Julia Child and surrounded by people who in one way or another made me smile. Staring through my glass, filled with the fruits of a night's harvest, I looked around me. The cats played underfoot as dishes were being passed, more wine being poured, stories being shared and the sounds of laughter danced above the table in the arms of the candles' glow. It had all created a warmth and spirit that I'd always associated with the idea of Thanksgiving. But there was also a sense of closeness that I had forgotten could exist.

Later, as I was falling asleep, I wondered whether the others had thought about their families — and if they did how they felt. My mind drifted to past Thanksgivings — how different they'd become from 10 years ago. So different that it was hard to imagine they had ever occurred. Everyone looked so different — who were those people sitting around the dining room table? I don't even remember being there. It was foggy. They seemed like strangers fading into time.

"Come out to the car," my housemate called into the living room.

"Why?" my other housemate and I responded.

"I have a present for you," he said smiling like the Cheshire cat. The two of us looked at each other confused.

"What?" we asked, cautious of our housemate's bizarre sense sense of humor.

"I have a present for you, come out to the car!" he laughed impatiently.

We looked at each other again and our cautious grins turned into child-like smiles upon the return of Dad from a business trip. We jumped up, put on our shoes and ran out to the driveway. He stood next to his car like Santa next to his sleigh. Running to the car window, we peered inside and began gleefully screaming. Inside the little Nissan was a seven foot Christmas tree.

I didn't grow up believing that home was where the heart was. I never had a comprehension of feeling that way — not until that moment standing in the street. As I entered the kitchen I looked around and couldn't help but smile. After traveling a very long and weathered road, a bridge had been crossed leaving one reality for another.

E.C. Thomas

As we strung up the colored lights and created ornaments out of kitchen utensils, I began feeling really strange. And as I later stood in the kitchen making dinner, while my housemates watched TV, the smell of pine came through the doorway. I turned around facing the living room, the tree lights reflected off the frosty window and into my eyes. It was dizzying. Scattered memories made their way at me like attacking fireworks exploding with deja vu. For a moment, I didn't know where I was.

I turned back around and resumed stirring my pasta. The old memories of home had slowed down enough for me to see, but were too distant for me to understand. They seemed like scenes in someone else's movie, for no clear feelings stirred themselves in me. Only a strange notion that a certain reality had disappeared.

It began snowing. By 1 a.m. the waterfall across the street had beckoned us to come frolic next to its shoreline. Bounding out into the street we immediately took on the self-survival technique of finding cover and gathering ammunition – it was every housemate for themself.

Finally growing tired, we walked back towards the house. As we turned the corner, our voices became hushed and we stopped in the middle of the street. Nestled in between a pink haze over the roof and a white blanket on the ground, was the gracious sight of #180. Within the satellite shading the bright lights shined through the window like colored stars. With small smiles we peacefully walked around to the kitchen door.

I didn't grow up believing that home was where the heart was. I never had a comprehension of feeling that way — not until that moment standing in the street. As I entered the kitchen I looked around and couldn't help but smile. After traveling a very long and weathered road, a bridge had been crossed leaving one reality for another. Somewhere between unloading a U-Haul and cooking our first turkey, an entity had been created. It wasn't just the legend of #180 — it was the family that lived there.

Missing the comforts of home

As we approach the semester's end, I've begun to reflect on my first year and a half away from home. I see my parents very infrequently, and I've often succeeded in convincing myself that I've grown out of needing my mom to wash my dishes and do my laundry. The piles of dirty socks and stacks of salsa–encrusted dishes rotting around my room might argue to the contrary. To me, a trip home is an opportunity to stop pretending I am capable of surviving on my own.

My biggest concern over the five day Thanksgiving break was how I could manage to spend the entire time eating while spending the entire time sleeping. In retrospect, I think I achieved a most equitable balance of the two, without any significant time diverted to other activities, aside from the 20 minutes I took to give a hat a much needed washing.

Thomas E. Akyali

While relaxing to the point of boredom, I nevertheless found this Thanksgiving less than satisfying. I had looked forward to basking in the comfortable aura of my parents, aunts, uncles and other assorted family. Unfortunately, my father failed to arrive as scheduled from his business in the Middle East. His absence, compounded with the recent move of other family members to Texas, left my mother and I in an uncharacteristically empty kitchen.

While we tried to entertain ourselves with the Thanksgiving Day parade and a Broadway show, we felt the ache of a family torn this year. Not having to fight my cousin for control of the remote, not answering my dad's customary "why don't you have a major, job, girlfriend, all of the above?" type questions. Certainly the joy of family, I believe, is in the familiarity and comfort it provides.

On Sunday afternoon, after a final home cooked breakfast, I thanked my mother for her hospitality. It seemed unnatural at first, thanking her for letting me sleep in my own bed, eat at the kitchen table and use the same towels I've always used. Nevertheless, I couldn't ignore the feeling that I was a guest now, a transient and not a fixture. I'm sure this feeling will only amplify with time, and as I get older I can only imagine myself becoming more and more detached from what goes on at home. It is a simple observation of course, and a natural process, but it is still a fearsome proposition.

Must I be forced to learn the ways of the washing machine? Is the purchase of a sponge and a bottle of Palmolive somewhere in my future? Not to cast my mother in the light of a servant, she is a college educated professional, but she has always been there to cater to and look after her only child. I can cook only scrambled eggs, pasta and microwave popcorn, if such preparation entails cooking.

Did my parents fail to raise a well–adjusted son, able to adjust comfortably to life on his own? I wouldn't go that far. I simply miss the ease of life at home, of having dinner on the table and my socks matched and folded on my bed. Are these sentiments a manifestation of my laziness? Perhaps, but who wouldn't enjoy having such menial tasks done for them?

When I thanked my mother on Sunday afternoon, I was thanking for more than four days of hospitality. I never appreciated what a family was worth until my family disintegrated. While I'll never recapture the comfort of life at home, I can at least thank my mom for 18 years of patience and support. So, Ms. Page, or whatever name it is you go by, thanks.

Letters to the Editor

Tailgaters wish to bow out

To the editor:

As loyal, devoted readers of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, we the undersigned are outraged, dismayed, befuddled and generally shocked at the utter lack of journalistic responsibility held by your alleged sportswriter, Michael Reiss.

It seems Mr. Reiss has begun a tailgating contest in his football column and without any type of investigation, fact– checking or sampling of the delectables and libations we have to offer Mr. Reiss has placed us in last place in his so called "fair assessment" of one of our nation's most sacred pastimes — pre–game festivities.

The blatant display of nepotism that Reiss has shown by placing his father, Double R, in first place is an example of the shoddy journalism that many of today's writers find to be acceptable. We do not. Tailgating is not something to be taken lightly and Mr. Reiss's mockery has gone on long enough.

If only Mr. Reiss would have ventured down the tailgating vessel (which he was given precise directions to) on Sunday Nov. 20 at the Patriots–Chargers game he would have discovered the following: a menu consisting of assorted veggies, chips and dips, finger sandwiches, pizza prepared over the open flame, two–day marinated chicken and beef in an exquisite ginger/teriyaki sauce, rolls of all sizes, peanuts, pretzels, home–made brownies and of course barley–laden beverages as well as assorted liquors and soda. Furthermore he would have found a specially installed paper towel rack within the tailgating vessel, seating for upwards of 12 tailgaters (something he clearly is not), a small television for pre–game viewing pleasure, proper trash receptacles, the 1994 Patriots Media Guide for quick trivia and one dismembered plastic horn from a Viking helmet which was wrestled from an angry Viking during the previous week's stunning upset.

But Mr. Reiss wouldn't know about these aspects of our tailgate and sadly, wouldn't understand. Instead he continues to judge his mock contest from an imaginary perch somewhere above Route One. With all due respect to elder Double R, we think even him with his half century of wisdom would enjoy our tailgate like no other. His son is too young and naive to comprehend this.

For these and numerous other reasons, we the undersigned wish to withdraw from the fraudulent contest and ask that Mr. Reiss judge only that which he knows, and not that which he imagines.

Thank you for your time.

P.S. Go Pats.

Graffiti disturbs peace lover

To the editor:

I am writing to express my horror and disgust at the spray painted anti–Semitic graffiti on the Greenfield synagogue over the weekend. (Channel 40 News, 11/27.)

As a person with pale skin, I felt angry at the spray painted words, "white supremacy." As a person with Native American heritage, I felt afraid when I saw the swastikas and the "Hail Hitler" (sic.) I was very disturbed a the report that similar graffiti had been found at our UMass–Lowell.

As a Gentile I find that we ignore hateful anti–Semitism all too often. What is written on the walls could very well be under the surface here — I urge us to listen carefully and interrupt anti–Semitism whenever we hear it.

Furthermore, I urge us as Gentiles to look at our own anti– Semitism. Do you believe that all Jews are privileged? That anti–Semitism isn't as serious an offense as other prejudices? That Jews control the media, banking industries, film industries? These are all harmful myths.

I call on all Gentiles to celebrate the beginning of Hanukkah by taking the initiative to stop anti–Semitism in ourselves and in the world around us.

The best & worst Christmas movies on ho–home video

By Dolores Barclay
Associated Press

You don't have to wait until the holiday season to enjoy Christmas movies, but now is when most people think of watching these family confections.

There are many on the market, ranging from the classic (Miracle on 34th Street, A Christmas Carol) to the perfectly awful (Annette Funicello in Disney's Babes in Toyland, Scrooged). A partial list of what's available:

All I Want for Christmas (1991): A sappy divorce tale starring Thora Birch as a little girl caught in the middle. Guess what she wants for Christmas?

Babes in Toyland (1961): A terrible Disney version (if there is such a thing) of the Victor Herbert operetta, starring Annette Funicello, Tommy Sands and Ray Bolger.

A Charlie Brown Christmas (1965): If you ever wondered what Christmas was all about, wonder no more. A magical treat from the Peanuts characters.

A Christmas Carol (1951): The best version, with often scary sequences. Stars Alastair Sim as a more broken and evil Scrooge, whose transformation is all the more poignant. Worthy of your video library.

Christmas in Connecticut (1945): A phony family for an advice columnist. Fast-paced fun, starring Barbara Stanwyck and Sydney Greenstreet.

A Christmas Story (1983): Jean Shepard's marvelous memory of Christmas in the 1940s and the ultimate gift, a regulation Red Ryder air rifle. You might want to add it to your video library.

A Disney Christmas Gift (1982): A real treat. The best of Disney, with special holiday shorts.

Dr. Seuss: Horton Hears a Who; The Grinch Who Stole Christmas (1974): Made-for-television animated shorts from the cartoon master himself, Chuck Jones.

Holiday Inn (1942): With music by Irving Berlin, and memorable performances by Fred Astaire and Bing Crosby, who could go wrong?

It's a Wonderful Life (1946): Frank Capra's black-and-white marvel, starring James Stewart as the man who makes the wrong wish and is saved.

March of the Wooden Soldiers (1934): Wonderful fantasy feature starring Stan Laurel and Oliver Hardy, who save the land of Old King Cole from the horrible boogeymen.

White Christmas (1954): Tepid remake of the far superior Holiday Inn, brightened up only by the presence of it's stars.

Mickey's Christmas Carol (1984): That resourceful little rodent plays Bob Cratchit in this spin of the Dickens' classic.

Miracle on 34th Street (1947): Do you believe in Santa Claus? A delightful tale, starring Natalie Wood, and far superior to the current theatrical release by John Hughes. Put this one in your video library.

Mr. Magoo's Christmas Carol (1962): The near-sighted one plays Scrooge.

The Muppet Christmas Carol (1992): Who could possibly want more? Kermit and Miss Piggy as the Cratchits!!!

National Lampoon's Christmas Vacation (1989): The Griswolds take Christmas with an assist from a slob of a cousin, Randy Quaid.

Santa Claus : The Movie (1985): Dudley Moore plays an elf in this enjoyable film. How fitting.

Scrooge (1970): Musical of Dickens' tale. Stars Albert Finney and Alec Guiness.

Scrooged (1988): One of the more disastrous versions of the Dickens story, saved only by Carol Kane as the ghost of Christmas Present. Stars Bill Murray doing his usual.

Tim Burton's The Nightmare Before Christmas (1993): Excellent animation and special effects, plus a good score and fanciful story make this a winner.

Punk lives as Green Day invades Mullins Ctr.

Openly gay Pansy Division initiates energetic concert

GREEN DAY
Mullins Center
Nov. 28

Though many would argue that punk rock was laid to rest when it became a marketable commodity, last Monday night punk revivalists Green Day proved they were not going down without a fight.

The Berkeley, Calif., trio's old school, Buzzcocks–style punk surprisingly became this year's biggest underdog success story and managed to make the rebellious genre a certified mainstream favorite.

Even with their newfound popularity the band seemed determined on the Mullins stage to show that, even in front of an arena–sized crowd, punk rock could still adhere to the same principles it did 20 years ago.

From spitting into the audience, to making derogatory remarks about the American flag, the band pulled out all the stops, culminating when lead singer/guitarist Billie Joe dropped his pants to the crowd and invited the Massachusetts police to take a look.

Although a large part of Green Day's appeal lies in their often relentless energy, the band came out of the starting gate a bit slow with the song "Chump."

They quickly picked up their stride by the third song, the band's career–breaking single "Longview," which left the previously dormant audience gleefully singing along, while the Mullins Center floor turned into a virtual sea of moshing bodies.

"This song is about you," said Billie Joe, before launching into the opening chords of "Basketcase," which sent the already pumped audience into a complete frenzy. From that point on the energy level never dropped as the band repeatedly blasted through song after song of pure punk furor.

Drummer Tre Cool, sporting a massive green mop of hair, remained a blur throughout the night, only emerging from behind his kit to lend vocals to the "secret hidden song" which closes their latest album Dookie and a mock country western tune that found Billie Joe filling in on drums.

Bassist Mike Dirnt exuberantly played his puppy bass–lines while he bounced around the stage lending his obligatory head twitches and knee jerks straight out of Punk Rock 101.

PAUL BLOCKAU / COLLEGIAN
Billie Joe led Green Day's rocking set at Mullins Center on Nov. 28.

While Cool and Dirnt's presence was dominant, the evening clearly belonged to Billie Joe. With his matted, bleached hair, complete with swinging dreadlocks, Joe staggered around the stage, baiting the crowd with streams of expletives, while punishing his Stratocaster with power chords galore.

"How many Satan worshippers we have here tonight?" joked Joe, obviously searching for any way to get the audience riled up. This "the more offensive the better" tactic seemed to be Joe's modus operandi throughout the night, clearly displayed during a cover of punk legends Operation Ivy's "Knowledge" in which Billie Joe unzipped his fly to an unsuspecting audience and simulated masturbation.

Although it seemed as though much of the packed arena were there to see Green Day's "hits," the band did not skimp out on some of their earlier favorites such as "2000 Light Years Away" from their album Kerplunk.

There is no denying that many of the songs performed throughout the night were indeed written from the same song book. Green Day is definitely not a ground breaking band, but as they proved in Mullins they are exceedingly good at what they do.

Thankfully the band had enough sense to keep their set relatively on the short side, keeping the somewhat "same–ish" songs from becoming tiresome.

Pansy Division, who have put out albums on Green Day's original label Lookout Records, opened the show with their gutsy brand of openly homosexual if not sometimes explicit pop/punk that was simple but at times catchy. Unfortunately much of the crowd didn't get the joke, since Pansy Division spent much of their forty-five minute set dodging debris thrown from the crowd.

Like Pansy Division, Green Day knows that a little musical skill and a lot of attitude go along way. By the time they finished their set with a rousing rendition of "She" it was clear, that if nothing else, Green Day have managed to take rock music back to it's initial elements—three chords, a bruising backbeat, and plenty of attitude. Stupid, immature and deliciously fun. A

Osteoporosis a growing, viable threat for college–aged women

By Peg Mitchel
Collegian Correspondent

Most women have been somewhat aware of the risks of developing osteoporosis in postmenopausal years. Yet research continues to find the same bone disorder patterns occurring among young, college–aged women, Kathy A. Fackelmann of Science News said.

Accelerated bone loss occurs with the cessation of menstruation at the time of menopause and in women who have irregular menses or amenorrhea. Such women often include athletes and dancers. These two situations are accompanied by estrogen deficiency as well as low levels of progesterone, two hormones likely to be major determinants of accelerated bone loss.

Two hormone estrogen acts to prevent bone resorption and decrease remodeling, whereas progesterone appears to promote bone formation and accelerate remodeling. Both of these are crucial in the menstrual cycle as well. A study conducted by Jerilynn C. Prior, Endocrinologist at the University of British Columbia, linked a short luteal phase of the menstrual cycle with decreased blood levels of progesterone. A short luteal phase strongly predicted bone loss for both runners and for their less athletic peers.

Ongoing problems with menstrual cycles, most common among female runners, dancers and gymnasts can cause irreversible bone loss that will eventually lead to osteoporosis, says Barbara L. Drinkwater, Ph. D., a research physiologist in Seattle.

While it has been found that low progesterone levels and bone loss are linked, there are several additional factors affecting bone loss among young and older women, says Nutrition Today. Other significant factors include heredity, physical activity and the intake of nutrients other than calcium which is the principal nutrient needed for bone loss prevention. All of these affect the development of peak bone mass early on and later in life, according to Dr. John B. Anderson of Nutrition Today.

Evidence exists for a strong hereditary role in the development of bone mass in women by the age of 25 or so, regardless of the consumption patterns of calcium and other nutrients. Physical activity, diet and hormonal balance all serve to fine tune the genetically predetermined bone.

For a large part these additional factors are under our control, and important to young women when considering that peak bone mass is attained by 35 years of age and cortical bone tissue may maximize by the mid–twenties.

According to Nutrition Today, the RDA for calcium at 1200mg/day for women between 19 and 24, is not the only dietary nutrient to consider. Although it is the principal dietary mineral needed for osteoporosis prevention, it does not function by itself in the body, said Anderson. Nutrients other than calcium such as protein, phosphorus, Vitamin D and zinc, exert important effects on calcium metabolism, although exact recommendations for bone loss prevention have not been agreed upon.

Another element exerting a strong effect on bone mass is physical activity. Regular physical activity that does not diminish estrogen production creates loads on the skeleton that enhances or maintains its mass, said Anderson.

Physically active adolescents may enhance their bone mass even more because of increased efficiency of intestinal absorption and improved skeletal intake of calcium and phosphorus obtained from meals. Young women such as runners, dancers and gymnasts on the other hand, may be exercising at such a high demand so as to damage their production of bone and estrogen.

Results suggest that the maintaining of peak bone density throughout adulthood require normal production of both estrogen and progesterone. Factors such as physical activity, nutrient intake, heredity and normal menses, all fit together in this complex and important connection.

"All the scientific evidence regarding osteoporosis is not in yet," says Jonathan V. Wright, M.D. in his Guide to Healing With Nutrition, "but there is enough available information to give you an excellent chance to prevent it."

Here are some helpful nutrition hints:

- Some of the top food sources of calcium are yogurt and milk, tofu, soybeans, sesame seeds, sardines, broccoli and kale.
- Sources of phosphorus include fish, poultry, meat, whole grains, nuts and seeds. The calcium phosphorus ration should be 2:1.
- Vitamin D is found in fish liver oils, salmon, tuna, milk and other dairy products.
- Sources of zinc include lamb chops, pork loin, wheat germ, pumpkin seeds, eggs and nonfat dried milk.

Britannica offers Internet access

UMass students have opportunity to tap info service

By Andrew Davidson
Collegian Staff

For the next two weeks, University of Massachusetts students have a unique opportunity to tap into a comprehensive information service, through a trial service offered by Encyclopedia Britannica.

Students with Internet accounts will be able to access Britannica Online, which contains encyclopedic volumes of over 44 million words, and allows access to Merriam-Webster's Collegiate Dictionary, the Britannica Book of the Year, and a full thesaurus.

"We've been able to tie into a special testing option," said John Nelson, an English professor who initiated the agreement with Britannica.

The trial service began Monday and will be available through next Sunday. The service will be especially helpful as final exams and papers are approaching, Nelson said.

With over 700,000 cross-referencing links, Britannica Online allows users to thoroughly research a wealth of subjects.

"One of the great things the Britannica Online gives you is a search engine of related topics," Nelson said.

"We want to provide current information, but don't wish to be an on-line news service, like Newsweek," said Gurke.

Encyclopedia Britannica, which was established in 1768, launched the service in mid-October, and houses its two national databases in Chicago and Lahoya, Calif.

The service has two ways of updating its information, according to Jim Gurke, national sales manager for Britannica Online. The first is an exhaustive updating, which happens quarterly. The other way is an ad hoc method, which happens more frequently.

to Lizana include asbestos removal, an elevator for the physically challenged, and fire escape ladders, is "not a top priority and not a bottom priority," a statement met with much disapproval.

Emotions ran especially high as Shamapande spoke of "a disabled student of color who has to carry himself up the [New Africa House] stairs every day". Bracey also told of an individual years ago who had to a endure similar struggle in the building.

When questioned as to whether or not he had the power to receive funding for New Africa House's needs, Scott responded emphatically. "Hell, yes. I can reach in and do just about anything I want. But it would be improper of me to bypass the line administrators."

The next demand proposed that athletic revenues be rerouted into funding academic excellence. Scott agreed that such a move could be "very healthy for the University," but said that presently the shift would not be possible due to new NCAA gender equity regulations.

In another move, sheets revealing the revenue of the men's basketball team, the focus of the demand, were distributed. Rumored to be anywhere from $15 to $20 million, the figure on paper read a surprising $1 million; many students attacked the validity of the document.

The final demand presented to Scott revolved around retaining the Minority Engineering Program, which could soon be subject to restructuring that might lead to its demise. "We want the students not to be left out of the decision- making process because we know what's going to work," Shamapande said.

Before wordlessly exiting the room as they had the last meeting, both Shamapande and Lizana strongly urged Scott to attend a follow-up meeting Monday night at New Africa House.

that we would have a stadium."

Kraft's proposal to the University was made in hopes that both sides would benefit.

By donating the use of Foxboro Stadium to UMass for the football program, Kraft said he hopes that the state will allocate funding for upgrades in highway access and improvements to the stadium.

"The Foxboro [proposal] would mean a significant improvement in the access to the stadium, and upgrades in the facilities," Scott said. "According to what I read in the papers this would be a $50 million investment."

According to Kraft, his proposal seems possible considering that last year state officials announced that they were ready to underwrite a $750 million megaplex in order to keep the Patriots in Massachusetts.

"I think this would justify the expenditure to the state, even in the minds of those who have been reluctant in the past," Kraft told the Boston Herald.

One of the areas which Scott stressed was important to possibility of UMass football going D-1A did not involve the stadium, but the students.

"Both President Hooker and I are concerned with gender equity," Scott said. "The University is moving toward the forefront of gender equity after the recent addition of two women's varsity sports."

Under NCAA regulations in Title IX, member schools must have both equal representation and equal funding for men and women in varsity sports.

According to Scott, if the University were to make the move to D-1A football, there would be both an increase in male participation in varsity sports and funding.

"The move to D-1A football would change the ratio," Scott said. "There would be more male players and scholarships for them. We would have to find some way to compensate the women."

Scott said that the University would have to create a clear plan to keep gender equity in varsity sports at UMass "somewhat equal."

"The addition of men in varsity sports with the football team becoming D-1A would be the subtraction of men in other varsity sports or the addition of women," Scott said.

■ immigrants

in Los Angeles Times, "Who's Keeping An Eye On The Border Patrol?," the findings of the American Friends Service Committee are noted. The A.F.S.C. "identified 285 complaints of physical abuse by the Border Patrol between May '89 and May '91, including seven deaths." Yet the INS Commissioner "refused to meet with...a human rights organization, to discuss [a] report of 'pervasive' conduct by border agents."

Some wonder what goes through the minds of Border Patrol officers as they commit these injustices? It is a commonly shared feeling among immigrants, that officials are overlooking the similarities between today's immigrants and the immigrants that came to the U.S. from Europe. Today's immigrants are said to be trying to do what America's ancestors did when they came to the "New World:" searching for religious freedom, economic prosperity, opportunity, and political freedom. For foreign observers it is incomprehensible how a country which is the product of immigrants can now turn its back on them.

Nor do Immigration officials acknowledge that these immigrants subject themselves to the relentless exploitation and dehumanization, inflicted upon them, in hopes of getting a glimpse of the "American Dream" that is so frequently referred to as "something that is accessible to anyone who desires it."

Some of California's officials overlook the fact that the state accepts that it does "benefit from the exploitation of immigrant labor." It is a fact that if it wasn't for the contributions of immigrants and the back-breaking labor they endure, the economy of California would probably be worse off than it is now. That is, a significant amount of the hard agricultural and industrial labor of California is done by immigrant workers, according to Harry Kubo of the Nisei Farmers League of San Joaquin Valley.

None of these issues seem to be considered or even acknowledged by the supporters of Proposition 187. They have not been willing to address accusations that the U.S. has systematically taken immigrants' land, and exploited and abused them, while attempting to rob them of any dignity or integrity. They have not brought to light that they are being accused of doing the same kind of things they have accused immigrants. For many people in this country, it seems as though Proposition 187 aims to point the finger at immigrants and use them as the scapegoats for society's own problems.

This Proposition seems to follow a pattern of oppression which the U.S. has been accused of by immigrants and citizens throughout its history. If enacted, Proposition 187 would, "leave in our midst an untouchable subclass of deeply exploited workers who labor as hard as any of us, yet who are to be denied the barest of means to better their condition," said Robert Scheer of the Los Angeles Times.

Minuteman trio suspended by league

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

The opportunity for the University of Massachusetts hockey team to get its first victory of the season has become an even tougher task.

Leading scorer Rob Bonneau, Mike Evans and Gerry Cahill have all been suspended by Hockey East for their involvement in a fight at the end of last Saturday's 7–4 loss at Boston University.

The three will miss Friday's game, but are eligible for Saturday's tilt with Merrimack. In accordance with NCAA rules, players ejected for fighting will be suspended for their next game. BU's Mike Sylvia and Jeff Kealty will sit out the Terriers' game on Friday.

"It happened, we'll have to deal with it," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "We will go with our next group of players, getting into our depth charts a little more."

UMass (0–8–1, 0–5 in HE), still searching for its first victory of the season, will host Merrimack (2–8–2, 1–4–2) on consecutive nights this weekend at the William D. Mullins Center.

Around Hockey East: Maine (10–0–3, 5–0–3) remains as the only undefeated school in the nation, as Shawn Walsh's club continues to be the surprise of Hockey East. Goaltender Blair Allison and a rock–solid defense have paced the Black Bears.

Several HE clubs performed well in tournaments over Thanksgiving weekend. Maine and BU (7–2–2, 4–1–2) reached the final of the Great Western Freeze–Out. The Terriers and Black Bears went through two UMass opponents to reach Sunday's final.

BU handled Princeton, who comes to Mullins on Dec. 16, 6–2, while Maine defeated Notre Dame 4–1. The Irish will be in Amherst for consecutive contests against the Minutemen on Dec. 30–31.

BU's Chris O'Sullivan was named HE Player of the Week, totaling three goals and three assists in the Terriers' 6–1 win over Harvard, and the two Freeze–Out games.

UMass–Lowell (5–4–3, 3–2–1) stormed the Great Alaska Face–off tournament held in Fairbanks, AK. The River Hawks won the tourney based on a 3–2 victory over Western Michigan, and ties with host Alaska Fairbanks and Illinois–Chicago.

Freshmen goalie Scott Fankhouser, a draftee of the NHL's St. Louis Blues, was named HE Rookie of the Week for his strong play in the win over Western Michigan (26 saves). Lowell Coach Bruce Crowder hopes that the tournament will continue its omen — each of the last two winners of the Face–Off, Maine (1992) and Lake Superior State (1993), have gone on to be NCAA champions.

Standings: Maine is on top with 32 points and BU is second with 25. Northeastern is third with 21 points while Lowell is fourth with 18.

PAUL BLODGEAU / COLLEGIAN

Mike Evans is one of the Minutemen who will sit out a game this weekend against the Merrimack Warriors.

Top Scorers: Individually, two sophomores who UMass has seen, have risen to the top of the scoring charts in the conference. Lowell's Greg Bullock has amassed 22 points (8 goals, 14 assists) in just six conference games.

BU's Mike Grier leads HE in goals with 10, good for 15 points. Maine defenseman Jeff Tory leads all conference defensemen in points with 12, and is second to Bullock in assists with 10.

Bonneau leads the Minutemen in scoring, registering four goals and two assists in nine games overall. Blair Wagar and Tom Sheehan are tied for second with five points a piece.

Weekend Action: There are no less than four two–game series between HE clubs. The first Minuteman game against Merrimack will be broadcast on the New England Sports Network.

"We would love to see a strong showing for that TV game. We'll need all the support we can get," Mallen said.

The marquee match–up of the weekend is BU–Maine. The conference's top two–teams square off Friday night in Orono, and then Saturday in Boston. Maine goalie Allison has played in every game, sporting an impressive 2.53 goals against average and a .889 save percentage.

Boston College–Northeastern, and New Hampshire–Providence are the other two match–ups. Saturday night's BC–Northeastern game will also be on NESN.

Conference Records: UMass goaltender Dave Kilduff set a Hockey East record with 50 saves in last Friday's 7–0 loss to BU. In that contest, UMass set the season conference attendance mark as 6,218 fans can to the Mullins Center. The crowd also marked the all–time UMass hockey record.

"I thank the fans for all the support. That BU crowd was great and they stood in their seats until the end of the game," Mallen said. "The team will need that kind of support again this weekend."

Fans react to No. 1 ranking

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Basketball fever has had a full grip on the University of Massachusetts since Coach John Calipari began instilling a winning tradition. But now following the Minutemen's rout of the defending National Champion Arkansas Razorbacks, and their rise to the No. 1 rank in both the Associated Press and USA Today/ CNN College Basketball Polls, the hysteria surrounding hoops at UMass has reached an epidemic.

> "I'm sort of in shock," said Himanshu Patel, a junior political science minor. "To be ranked No. 1 over traditional powers like North Carolina, Kentucky, and Arkansas is something I never thought I'd see.

Coach Cal's Closet and the University Store unveiled t– shirts with a large maroon No. 1 splashed across the front with the saying "Any Team...Any Time...Any Place!"

Students could not wait to display the school's new–found ranking, and a line formed as the shirts were unpacked, according to Mary Ellen Martin, the assistant merchandise manager at the University Store.

The students for the most part were excited by the Arkansas victory and the No 1. ranking.

"I'm sort of in shock," said Himanshu Patel, a junior political science minor. "To be ranked No. 1 over traditional powers like North Carolina, Kentucky and Arkansas is something I never thought I'd see.

"I'm surprised we won by 24, but we dominated every aspect of the game."

With optimism following the Arkansas victory, some fans hope that the Minutemen have not peaked to early.

"I'm kind of surprised," said sophomore communication major Teri Klein. "This is what they set their goals for. Hopefully, we'll be able to live up to the ranking."

Seth Goodman, a sophomore exercise science major, agreed.

"Hopefully they'll have enough confidence that they can beat anybody and stay No. 1 all throughout the year and win the title," Goodman said.

"Being No. 1 is nice and all, but you can't choke at the end," said Jamie Maxant, an undeclared sophomore.

Many students also believed that the publicity will be positive for the entire University.

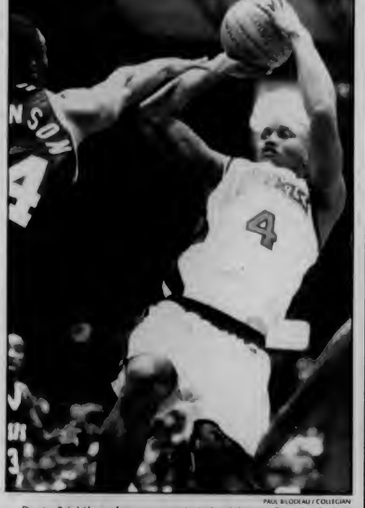
"I think it's good for the school," said junior Matt Burdulis, who was one of the small number of students present at the Tip Off Classic. "It will increase awareness that we're out there. A lot of people have a negative perception of us and this will shed a more positive light on the University."

Senior communication major James Parker downplayed the significance of the rank in terms of basketball itself, but agreed that the publicity will be a positive.

"I think it's unimportant at this point," he said. "But I think it brings great exposure to the University."

UMass will put its No. 1 ranking on the line this Saturday when they take on the Jayhawks of Kansas in the first annual John Wooden Classic in Anaheim, Calif. The UMass fans will get their first home look at the Minutemen Dec. 7, when the Pittsburgh Panthers come to town.

Collegian staff members Brian Perillo and Candice Flemming contributed to this article.



PAUL BLODGEAU / COLLEGIAN

Donta Bright's performance against the Arkansas Razorbacks is a major reason why the UMass Minutemen are ranked No. 1.

Sports briefs: BC freshman Herren likely to miss season

AUBURN HILLS, MICH (AP) — Chris Herren, Boston College's highly recruited freshman guard, will undergo surgery on his injured left wrist next Tuesday and likely miss the rest of the season. The announcement was made Tuesday night by Eagles coach Jim O'Brien just about an hour before Boston College played No. 8 Florida in the Great Eight.

The 6-foot-2 Herren sustained ligament damage in his non-shooting wrist when he fell in the opening half of the Eagles' season-opening victory over Cal Poly-San Luis Obispo last Friday night. He finished with 14 points, six assists and three steals as the Eagles won 97-60.

Herren averaged 26.1 points, 9.4 rebounds and 7.6 assists at Durfee High School in Fall River, Mass., where he was selected the state's player of the year as a junior and senior.

Herren was being counted on heavily to help the Eagles, who lost four seniors from the team that lost to Florida in the East Regional final last season.

New economic system possible for MLB

LEESBURG, Va. (AP) — Owners will impose a new economic system if an agreement isn't reached this week, Atlanta Braves president Stan Kasten said.

Kasten and other members of the owners' bargaining committee met with mediator W.J. Usery at an executive conference center. Union officials met with players and were to meet this morning with Usery. A joint session is set for this afternoon. All owners are scheduled to meet next Monday in Chicago, two days before clubs must decide whether to offer salary arbitration to their former players who became free agents.

McCartney's replacement named

BOULDER, Colo. (AP) — Rick Neuheisel, Colorado's quarterbacks and receivers coach, was hired as head coach, replacing Bill McCartney. Neuheisel, 33, joined Colorado this season after seven years as an assistant at UCLA. McCartney, who resigned Nov. 19, will coach Colorado (10-1) in the Fiesta Bowl against Notre Dame.

(AP) — After a four-day break, negotiators in the NHL labor dispute plan to resume talks Thursday.

It will be the first bargaining talks between the league and the NHL Players Association since talks in Boston on Saturday.

ATLANTA (AP) — George O'Leary, who replaced Bill Lewis on a interim basis after Georgia Tech's 1-7 start, will return next season despite going 0-3. O'Leary, 48, who had been the team's defensive coordinator, returned to Georgia Tech this season after two years with the San Diego Chargers.

HOUSTON (AP) — Houston coach Jeff Fisher fined receiver Webster Slaughter one game check and threatened to suspend him for the season for his critical comments following Sunday's loss at Cleveland.

CINCINNATI (AP) — Cincinnati safety Louis Oliver has a cracked bone below his left kneecap and will not play again this season. Oliver was injured in Sunday's loss to Denver.

NEW YORK (AP) — The New York Mets acquired right-hander Pete Harnisch from Houston for at least one player to be named. Harnisch, 28, was 8-5 with a 5.40 ERA last season after going 16-9 with a 2.98 ERA in 1993.

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico (AP) - Texas catcher Ivan Rodriguez was hospitalized with a mosquito-carrying fever that has reached near-epidemic proportions on the island.

STATESBORO, Ga. (AP) - Georgia Southern coach Frank Kerns and assistants Mike Backus and Mark White resigned because of allegations that a recruit was given improper academic help with their knowledge.

Doug Durham, the only remaining member of the staff, directed the team in an 87-57 loss to Georgia, coached by his father, Hugh Durham.

NEW YORK (AP) — Orlando guard Anfernee Hardaway, who averaged 32.3 points, 6.5 rebounds and 6.5 assists in four victories, is the NBA player of the week.

TOKYO (AP) — According to Japanese media reports, Asian Games officials said banned substances have been detected in the urine samples of 11 Chinese athletes. The officials, who were not identified, said samples indicated the athletes had abnormally high levels of the hormone testosterone or other performance-enhancing substances.

McNair out of Heisman Race after weekend loss

Anthony Guido On College Football

The Heisman Trophy has a leader, a couple of players still in contention, and one who is out of it. The regular season is just about over. We do have some surprises and certainly, some disappointments.

First of all, one Steve McNair of Alcorn State is out of the Heisman race, thanks to the No. 1 ranked Youngstown St. Penguins. McNair had his chance on ESPN last Friday in the first round of the Division I–AA playoffs. Well, YSU made the most of the opportunity, whipping Alcorn 63–20.

Alcorn St. plays in the SWAC, a below average I–AA conference, which has never won a playoff game (0–16). Many TV analysts (for or against McNair) have criticized his conference opponents, mostly for their terrible defenses. ESPN's Craig James and Lee Corso stated that McNair failed against the closest to I–A competition he could face.

That's just it — people need to realize that he did fail. He did pass for over 500 yards, but on over 80 attempts. McNair was intercepted three times, amassing his yardage in the second half when the game was lost. YSU discovered a secret: keep McNair in the pocket and you can fluster him into bad decisions.

And the winner is: Rashaan Salaam of Colorado. He has ran for well over 2,000 yards and is the most deserving of this year's lot. Penn State's Ki–Jana Carter and QB Kerry Collins have almost offset each other.

The award will be given out on Dec. 10, and this year's winner will go in with little fanfare as compared to the last few seasons.

This season's biggest disappointments: This list must begin with two teams of that wonderful conference, the Pac– 10. One faithful reader and Pac–10 fan has written a letter defending this conference. Well, K.D., defend UCLA and Arizona.

Arizona was supposed to take that next step and challenge for the national championship. Well, that offense is so anemic and the great defense failed against USC and Colorado State.

UCLA just bombed. Has anyone seen J.J. Stokes, he of the phantom injury? The Bruins went 5–6; a change may be needed at the top here.

Notre Dame (6–4–1) has to qualify for this list. The Irish lost to BYU at home, one of the worst losses ever in South Bend. Eternal crybaby Lou Holtz has to be criticized for his handling of young QB Ron Powlus.

Virginia Tech was also supposed to make that jump into Top 10 land. Three losses later and the Hokies are just as obscure. They didn't show up at Miami (a 24–3 loss) and got hammered by Virginia (42–24), to close out the regular season.

Big surprises: Oregon is going to the Rose Bowl. Beating USC, Arizona and drilling Stanford (55–17), has made people believers. The Ducks (green and yellow) have one of the best uniforms in college football, but will need more than those duds against Penn St. in the Rose Bowl.

Colorado State is in the WAC, but a 10–1 season was not expected from the Rams. Winning at Arizona made their season and ruined the Wildcats'. CSU in the Holiday Bowl, who would have thunk it? Or maybe the question is: who really cares? Or maybe: how much will Michigan pound them by?

Why do the Bowls stink? Most of the Bowls are set and looking pretty ugly. Start on Christmas Day. Forget the mistletoe, eggnog, and the giving and receiving of gifts. Do nothing but watch the always fun Aloha Bowl.

Kansas St. has a great QB (Chad May) and only two losses. Having to play a bowl so early is ridiculous, they should be playing on Jan. 2. The opponent: Boston College, lucky to be in a bowl, at least gets a trip to Hawaii.

Fiesta: Colorado vs. Notre Dame. The Buffs will finish off a punch–drunk ND squad. Carquest: The name is enough to hate this one. It may be West Virginia vs. South Carolina. These teams should be playing golf on Jan. 2, not football.

On to the weekly picks, with the season record very average (15–14). There are only three games this weekend, but let's pick 'em all:

Army 14, Navy 10 — The Cadets win in the classic game. Running back Akili King is as good as they come, as is this rivalry.

Hawaii 19, Air Force 17 — The Rainbows pull the upset. A great uniform contest, the rainbow–helmet green–shirted Hawaii team upends Air Force and their fearsome blue lightning bolts. Wow, keep in mind there are only 3 games this weekend.

Florida 27, Alabama 21 — The Gators rebound from last weekend's tie to knock 'Bama from title contention in the SEC championship game.

■ Chancellor's visit confirms the unsafe conditions of building

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

As promised in a Tuesday meeting with the Black Student Union, Chancellor David K. Scott took action on the renovation of the New Africa House.

Because of time constraints, Scott himself was unable to tour the building; however, Environmental Health and Safety representatives, accompanied by other administrators, did inspect the building for approximately a half-hour early yesterday morning.

In the meeting two days ago, the BSU discussed with Scott his responses to the list of demands presented earlier this month; one of those demands addressed the need for the renovation of the New Africa House.

Accepting a student's invitation in last night's meeting, Scott did visit Professor John Bracey's "Black Sociological Thought" class for a brief time in the afternoon, joined by Deputy Vice Chancellor Marcellette Williams and Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Thomas Robinson.

"It's always good for a chancellor to come see the dynamics of a class," Scott said of the lecture/discussion which focused on the drug trade in the Black community. "I really haven't gotten a chance to do that much this year."

Before Scott arrived, New Africa House Space Coordinator Penny Cameron gave the other administrators a tour of the five floors, pointing out many portions of the building that have deteriorated due to poor upkeep.

"The offices are an accident waiting to happen," Cameron said later. "And there are always people in the building."

In Cameron's own office on the top floor, several examples of possible safety hazards could be found, as well as evidence supporting her claim that janitorial services are seldom performed.

The latex paint used to cover the coat of lead paint originally on the walls was chipping badly, exposing the dangerous sub-layer; rainwater leaks on the presently inoperative phosphorous light strip hanging from the ceiling; and, Cameron herself had to remove a beehive that had been constructed in her screenless window, one of many in the various offices.

Additionally, none of the telephone lines on the floor are in working condition and the trash hasn't been emptied since last semester.

"If you don't bring your trash downstairs to designated areas, it doesn't get taken out," Cameron said. "I'm pretty sure the Chancellor doesn't have to bag up his trash and take it down to the first floor of Whitmore."

Yet, the fourth is not the only floor much in dire need of attention.

A few years ago, the New Africa House included a day- care center for students with children; however, according to Cameron, the refusal of insurance companies to cover the building forced the program to be discontinued.

BSU Vice President Dan Lizana also pointed out a leak in a third-floor bathroom that he says creates a quite noticeable puddle during even moderate rain.

In the basement, Lizana found the door to the boiler room unlocked, and showed that the entire ceiling is coated with asbestos; he suggested that the pipes and third-floor carpet may still contain the cancer-causing material as well.

Professor Dorrance Hill, who supervises the metal shop located next to the boiler room, noted that there have been rodent problems in the basement for a long while.

"[The administration] sends an exterminator every now and then," Hill said. "But it's a constant problem."

Most importantly, the building's exterior, which has one available staircase and another emergency staircase (which is locked presently), is not equipped with fire escapes; Bracey, who says his class is usually "packed" expressed his concern for the well-being of his students should a blaze begin.

Official indication that the New Africa House is more than overdue for refurbishment hung next to the boiler room door.

A certificate of inspection issued by the Department of Public Safety of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts read that the certificate expired Nov. 30, 1993, a year ago to the day of the Chancellor's visit.

Cameron feared that "sick building" syndrome, which led to a shutdown of UMass-Boston last year, might be a result of the improper maintenance. Overall, she had mixed feelings on the day's events.

"I'm glad [the administrators] came to visit," Cameron said. "They asked some exceedingly pertinent questions."

She went on to say that she was still somewhat skeptical because of a manner amongst the Health and Safety representatives which she perceived as being not particularly surprised at the plethora of eyesores.

"The attitude was 'It's not that bad,'" Cameron said. "[The representatives] see the problem as being common to other buildings on campus."

Lizana said that he believed the visit was a "step in the right direction", but also expressed wariness of Chancellor Scott.

"There's a good chance he's going to step back and let others take over," Lizana said.

Bracey offered a more optimistic outlook.

"I think [the administrators] got a clear understanding of our working conditions," Bracey said. "I trust they'll take care of what needs to be done."

Collegian files official complaint over limited access to police records

By Tracy Monahan
Collegian Staff

In response to delays and coverups by the University of Massachusetts Department of Public Safety, the Massachusetts Daily Collegian has filed a formal complaint with the supervisor of public records through the Secretary of State's Office.

Collegian staff members are concerned by the limited access to police records, because, according to Editor in Chief Darienne J. Hosley, it does not allow for accurate or timely reporting. She said it also diminishes the newspaper's ability to spot trends in crimes or crime areas and inform the public about such incidents.

"As they say in the Safety & Security Information Report 'an informed public is a safety-conscious public,'" Hosley said. "People on this campus have a right to know what kind of crimes are being committed and where."

The complaint, which was sent to Supervisor James W. Igoe on Nov. 21, charges the Department with failure to comply with state records laws. The Massachusetts public record law states that any person has an absolute right of access to public information.

"The complaint was filed because what the police are doing is illegal," Hosley said. "What's worse is that the Collegian isn't the only newspaper affected by this. Public Safety's policies are keeping other Valley newspapers from being able to do their job and somebody has to take steps to make the police follow the law."

The current system of information gathering, which the Collegian charges is unworkable, allows for a reporter to see a "press log" which does not list all the valid complaints the police respond to on a daily basis. In order to receive more information and a copy of the daily log, a written request must be sent to the department.

"If we can't get this information, then how can the Gazette and the Union News accurately cover campus crimes?" News Editor Kelly Spang said. "Without being able to report crimes and crime trends on a competent and timely basis, we are being irresponsible to the campus community."

The state law reads: "Each police department shall make, keep and maintain a daily log . . . recording, in chronological order, all responses to valid complaints received, crimes reported, the names, addresses of persons arrested and the charges against such persons arrested."

It says the entries must be provided to any member of the public during regular business hours, at no charge. Any inquiries into the requester's status or motivation are expressly prohibited by the law.

Collegian staff members say they believe that all incidents are not reported on the daily log, and included in their complaint that they are questioned on both their identity and reason for wanting to see the records.

The problems began last year when Spang, a news associate, and another staff member approached the Department. Spang said they did not believe all incidents were being recorded on the press logs.

At that time Spang said they were not told there was a problem with the software and were told that all reported events would go on the logs.

The problems with the Department continued when Jessica Taverna, an associate news editor at the Collegian, attempted to gather more information on specific incidents reported on the press logs. She filed a written request asking for a more complete version of the log for four specific days.

Fourteen days after she filed her request, four days past the 10-day deadline set up by state law, Taverna received the daily log, but it only listed the nature of the complaint and the day it occurred. No other information was included.

"I'm not going to say they are covering things up, but if they wanted to do that, this system would make it really easy," Taverna said.

A comparison between the press releases and the actual daily log revealed that several crimes and complaints are not listed on the press version, which Spang said she was told is supposed to compensate for the daily log.

On Oct. 19 the press log listed one arrest on a traffic stop. The actual daily log, given to the Collegian almost a month later, listed one motor vehicle theft, larceny, vandal-

Illegal, legal immigrants threatened by Prop. 187

By Juan Jose Chacon Quiros de Quetzalcoatl
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the third of a four-part series.

According to The Great American History Fact Finder, laws regulating immigration were first enacted in 1798 under the Alien Enemies Act. Later in 1882, Congress passed the Chinese Exclusion Act barring Chinese laborers from entering the country. The same applied to Japanese laborers with the Gentleman's Agreement in 1907. Could Proposition 187 become another law against non-European foreign immigration?

News Analysis

Starting in 1929, the National Origins Act limited immigration from outside the western hemisphere and was followed by the Immigration and Naturalization Act of 1952 that gave a limited amount of quotas for Asians. In the period between 1820 and 1975 most of the immigrants came from European countries. But in the period between 1976 and 1986, the large majority of immigrants have come from countries like Mexico, Vietnam, the Phillipines and Korea.

It is in this context that Proposition 187 comes about. California Gov. Pete Wilson has decided that it is time to make the Federal Government pay for services immigrants use. The first of series of lawsuits claims that the Federal Government should be responsible for the cost of incarcerating illegal immigrants.

"The Internal Naturalization Service should take custody of and deport illegal immigrant inmates upon the completion of their sentences," the lawsuit states. The lawsuit claims that the state of California pays $400 million every year incarcerating illegal immigrants. These "illegal immigrants" go to jail because of their visa status or lack of status.

The second lawsuit Wilson is sponsoring will try to force the federal government in securing the borders. Already the Clinton Administration has promised a $180 million increase for Borcer Patrol units. According to the lawsuit that is "roughly one-tenth the amount California spends in educating illegal immigrants in our schools."

The third lawsuit is trying to force the federal government to reimburse the states for the cost of providing services to illegal immigrants. "One of the reasons the federal government has not been forced to confront this . . . is that the states of California, Texas and Florida have had to bear a huge portion of the costs for the failure of federal policy," President Clinton said.

According to the Office of the Gov. Pete Wilson, the costs include the incarceration of 16,700 adult illegal aliens at an annual cost of $21,000 per inmate, the incarceration of 600 illegal aliens "designated as youthful offenders" at a cost of $31,000 a year per ward and the cost of parole supervision for 4400 undocumented illegal aliens who have not been deported by the INS.

In a packet of information put out by Wilson's office, article IV, section 4, of the United States Constitution is noted: "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government,

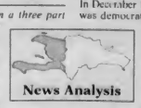
Belance to speak on U.S.–Haiti relations

By Juan Jose Chacon Quiros de Quetzalcoatl
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the second in a three part series examining issues which will be presented at the upcoming women's conference on Saturday.



News Analysis

In 1492, Christopher Columbus' flagship boat was wrecked off the coast of the island of Hispaniola. The local Taino leader and the native population saved all its people and cargo. Haiti is also the birthplace of the first successful slave revolt that began in 1791, against French colonialism under the leadership of Toussaint L'Overture, Jean Jacques Dessalines and Henri Christophe.

The subsequent checkered history of Haiti has been best described by the democratically elected President Reverend Jean-Bertrand Aristide in a speech to the United Nations, "After 500 years of resistance and 200 years of independence besieged by institutional violence. Haiti nourishes its land with its own flesh and blood."

In December 1990, Reverend Jean-Bertrand Aristide was democratically elected President of Haiti. He was brought to power by the efforts of a grassroots political coalition, Lavalas. Aristide's programs included redistributing wealth in the nation, education and health care for all. Reverend Aristide suggested forming a Haitian funded and trained military to avoid foreign control.

In Sept. 1991, he was overthrown in a coup d' etat less than nine months after his elections. The government was seized by CIA personnel Lieutenant General Raul Cedras, police chief Michael Francois, Rambi and members of the FRAPH.

Alerte Belance was an activist in Lavalas. She lived with her husband and three children in Port-au-Prince. She sold rice in the market while her husband was an ironworker. After the military coup, she was kidnapped from her home by gunmen on Oct. 16, 1993 and taken to a body dumping ground, a field outside Titayen.

That morning at 1 a.m. while the family was asleep, they heard gun shots. Alerte answered the door and met a person who demanded to see her husband. She told them that he was not at home and they subsequently, dragged her off. There she was brutally tortured with a machete, her right arm, ear and tongue cut off and she was left for dead. Alerte survived with the help of medical personnel who treated her. Three of her children and her husband were granted political asylum in the United States. She is called Mother Courage.

At the conference she will speak on the recent agreement and the effect of the U.S. occupation on her country.In June of this year, Alerte announced a lawsuit against the organization she holds responsible for her torture, FRAPH. The lawsuit was filed by the Center for Constitutional Rights in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn under the Alien Tort Claims Act, which permits resident aliens whose rights were violated in other countries to file cases in the U.S.

Repeated requests for more information were denied by UMass Court Officer Phil Cavanaugh, who cited the Criminal Offenders Records Information Law (CORI). According to state law, CORI protects information about a criminal offender, and only applies to closed criminal cases.

An Oct. 26 meeting between members of the Department and Collegian staff yielded little result. UMass Police Chief John W. Luippold said the compilation of a daily log was impossible due to "software problems." He also said he was aware that his department was not in compliance with state law.

"I know we are not in compliance with the law," Luippold said at the meeting.

Both Luippold and Sidney Myers, an attorney for the University, did not return the Collegian's calls.

Students affected by rent control

Senate attempting to keep off–campus living prices down

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts are attempting to support the reinstatement of a unique system of rent control which was eliminated due to Election Day results.

Last night the Undergraduate Student Senate passed a motion "that the University endorse the Home Rule Petition for rent review which is to be voted on during the special Town Meeting of January 30, 1995."

According to the Senate, rent control and rent review, which were abolished with the passage of Question 9, are used by many members of the University "for protection against unjustified increases in rent by their landlords."

The state law allows for the legislature to grant "Home Rule" to give communities the opportunity to exercise local options in areas, including, but not limited to housing and roads, according to the Senate.

The town of Amherst will hold the special meeting to decide whether or not to petition the Legislature for "Home Rule" on rent review.

The Housing Review Board (Rent Review) allows for tenants who believe that their rent is not "fair and reasonable" to petition the Board in order for to be lowered, according to the Rights and Responsibilities as a Landlord or Tenant handbook.

"The Amherst Housing Review Board is a five–person committee that is empowered to review rent levels and lower them if the rent is in excess of a fair market formula," said Joan Levenson, director of the Commuter Services and Housing Resource Center [CSHRC].

The Board was empowered by a 1986 Town by–law to review rents in Amherst, according to the handbook, which was prepared by the CSHRC and the Housing Partnership/Fair Housing Committee for the town of Amherst.

The Board can adjust rents and/or deny an increase in accordance with the by–law or building and sanitary codes. Tenants who chose to utilize the Board are fully protected against possible retaliatory actions and evictions from their landlord.

"The Board acts as a decelerator of rent increases," Levenson said. "It covers all the rentals for the town, except any owner occupying buildings of three units or less and sabbatical units, buildings which have been rented out for 12 months or less."

The Board will not automatically lower rent, unless the rent is found to be unfair and unreasonable according to the guidelines set by the by–law.

The Senate had nearly full support from its body in the vote to pass the motion to endorse the Home Rule Petition for rent review, which affects UMass commuters who live in Amherst.

"I'm really glad that the Student Senate has voted to support the University community in an effort to keep living costs down for commuters," said Jay A. Crossland, chair of the public policy for the Student Government Association.

U.N. warns of troop pullout in Bosnia

By Srecko Latal
Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia–Herzegovina — Snubbed by Serbs and unable to arrange a cease–fire, U.N. Secretary–General Boutros Boutros–Ghali said Wednesday it may be time to send peacekeepers home.

Unless the Bosnian Serbs and Muslim–led government agree to talk peace and cooperate with the United Nations, "it will become impossible" to persuade the Security Council to keep peacekeepers in Bosnia, he said after a six–hour visit to Sarajevo. But he said he will not recommend a pullout "for the time being."

Boutros–Ghali's remarks were the first time he has threatened a withdrawal. They reflect a growing frustration as the Serbs continue their assault on Bihac, the Muslim–led government refuses new concessions, U.N. peacekeepers are being held hostage and the Western alliance is divided about how to respond.

A decision to withdraw the 24,000 peacekeepers would come from the Security Council, where there is "absolutely no evidence" of support for a withdrawal, said Colin Keating, New Zealand's U.N. ambassador.

French Ambassador Jean–Bernard Merimee said "there is no question" of a withdrawal, "but if the situation continues to deteriorate, it will be more difficult to keep the troops there." More than 200,000 are dead or missing in the 31–month conflict launched by Serbs who rebelled against a Muslim–Croat vote to declare independence from Serb–led Yugoslavia.

Serbs have rejected a peace plan that would reduce their holdings in Bosnia to 49 percent from about 70 percent.

Bosnian President Alija Izetbegovic told Boutros–Ghali that Bosnia would negotiate only if Serbs accept the plan. He said the government has proposed a three–month cease–fire, but the Serbs want something more permanent.

Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadzic refused even to meet Boutros–Ghali. The U.N. chief said Karadzic "has done his people a great disservice."

The Bosnian Serbs wouldn't mind seeing the United Nations leave Bosnia, believing it would allow them to force the government to settle on Serb terms.

Boutros–Ghali's visit followed admissions from top U.S. and NATO officials that they can't force a solution to the conflict without a huge ground force no one is willing to provide.

■ Prop. 187

and shall protect each of them against invasion. . ."

In a letter to President Clinton, Dianne Feinstein speaks of 392,000 "illegal immigrants" that are given education, 23,000 that are incarcerated, and 390,00 that use health benefits including 90,000 babies that were delivered in "fiscal year 1994–95."

Wilson said he believes that Proposition 187 will bring some fairness to this issue; "The time has come to end illegal immigration as we know it." However, he has not been willing to talk about the positive effects immigrants have on the economy. A recent study by the Manhattan Institute, "The Index of Leading Immigration Indicators," indicates that there are many misconceptions about immigrants.

According to the study, the percentage of foreign born people has increased over the years. However, it is still very small compared the rest of the population. When it comes to education, immigrants are less likely to finish high school but if they do, they are more likey to get a doctorate's degree.

An article in Economist magazine called, "The best Americans" deals with some of these misconceptions. "Immigrants often seem to present better examples of 'American values\ than do native–born Americans," the author says. In percentage terms, immigrants get married more often but get divorced less. Also, the immigrant's family is made of four or more people in 40 percent of the cases (compared with the national average of 25 percent).

Proponents of 187 have tried to make a clear distinction between illegal and legal immigrants. They have found strong criticism from people that became legal immigrants through the "immigration amnesties" of the 1980s. "What is the difference? At list we have some native blood in our veins and our ancestors owned this land. The people that came from Europe cannot claim to be legal immigrants," said Carlos, 30–years–old, who walked from the state of Chiapas in southern Mexico to San Diego five years ago.

Some foreign leaders have joined the parade criticizing Proposition 187. Carlos Salinas de Gortari, president of Mexico and NAFTA advocate, spoke strongly against the Proposition. "Racism is a now official in the United States," said Gortari, shortly after Proposition 187 had been approved during the November elections.

Art for Change, a California company, has produced a large number of artworks presenting their view on 187. In one of them, two people are looking through a fence with despair. The artwork says in both Spanish and English: "No human being is illegal." This kind of artistic expressing has become very popular and can now be found in many newspapers in California.

GOP blunders will prove costly

The changes in Washington leave me a little unsettled, and I'm not talking about the Gugliotta–Webber trade.

While I've contemplated moving to Canada, I've since managed to swallow the bitter pill and accept the fact that we now have a Republican congress. I do, however, feel it my duty as a responsible liberal to lobby my criticism against the bible thumpers who allegedly represent the majority of voters' sentiments.

Andrew Davidson

As Republicans go, I kind of like Bob Dole (R–Kan.). He is the voice of reason in an otherwise acutely idealistic party, and will be the one responsible for bipartisan legislation if it turns out to be more than just a pipe dream.

But it would be a tragedy of epic proportions if the GOP ratifies Jesse Helms (R–N.C.) as the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The fact that he's a backwater hick with little command of America's role in the New World Order is reason enough to keep him as far away as possible from the most important foreign policy post in Congress.

Helms is taking a circle the wagons approach to some of the nation's most important foreign policy decisions. "The foreign aid program has spent an estimated $2 trillion of the American taxpayers' money, much of it going down foreign ratholes, to countries that constantly oppose us in the U.N.," Helms said at a press conference in Raleigh, N.C. the day after the election.

And while his sound bites may rally the sentiments of his penny–pinching constituents, they fail to take into account the importance of American aid in the global arena. The Ukraine had the fourth–largest nuclear arsenal in the world and an 8,940 percent inflation rate in 1993. With the help of U.S. economic assistance, the government of a less than stable former Soviet Republic was coerced into relinquishing its right to the big red button, thus providing a sigh of relief across the world.

Foreign aid has proven to be an essential tool in American diplomacy in the post–World War II period, and will continue to be the cornerstone of what has been effective presidential decision–making for at least the past three administrations in foreign policy. Helms certainly has a long way to go before he outshines any recent president in foreign policy, and should establish a bit more clout before further issuing his two–bit opinion in the future.

During a speech regarding the president's potential visit to North Carolina, he declared that Clinton "better watch out if he comes down here. He'd better have a bodyguard."

To have partisan differences with a president of an opposing party is natural. But to even imply that his safety would ever be compromised undermines the effectiveness of foreign policy, something unthinkable coming from the potential chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

The GOP would maintain a lot more credibility if they nominated someone a little more responsible to the post during their caucus.

Now if you're wondering how a Minority Whip named Newt rose to the ranks of Speaker–of–the–House, you're not alone. The man who was the house minority leader for 14 years, Bob Michel (R–Ill.), had the misfortune to hang up his hat in an election dominated by Republicans, so Newt remains the top man for the post.

Michel didn't have the far–right reputation that Gingrich has earned, which is ironic. "I've got a more conservative voting record than Newt," Michel said in an interview with the Chicago Tribune. But people saw Michel as more moderate, a negative label in this dogmatic party, because he was more inclusive with the center of his party and more willing to build coalitions. "I have a different way of talking to people. I couldn't ignore the moderates."

Gingrich should realize that, although he'll be at the top of the House come January, power and authority are not synonymous. He has a long way to go before he's proven that he can build coalitions and keep his party ranks in line, much less ensure his legislation is impervious to Clinton's veto pen.

While some of their goals are noble, such as balancing the budget and reforming welfare, Republican leaders must be aware that in Washington, respect is derived action, not rhetoric.

Clinton proved that anyone can win an election if the public is angry enough. But it took him two years to learn that it takes more than sound bites and campaign promises to represent the public.

Smart Republicans will take a page from Dole's book and try to push through positive legislation, not systematically refuting the words of a president who, despite his bumpy ride through the last two years, still has more clout and authority than anyone in the GOP.

Hangin' in a neighborhood bar

It has to be done.

There I am, sitting in a bar at home with a bunch of my friends, drinking a few beers. The filthy bar I was at — let me just say the environment and its happenings that occurred in it were just too valuable to avoid remembering. And since I was worried that I could possibly forget what I was seeing if I had a few too many, I grabbed a pencil accompanying the karaoke slips and jotted some notes on the back of a friend's Camel Lights cigarette box. I'll admit, I go there with my friends each time I am home, but I guess I was extremely perceptive that night.

Andrew Bryce

First, here's some background information. The bar's location is ridiculously quaint. It's in the middle of a business park, about three buildings down from the police station. And the place itself? My friend described it best when he said the building is 30x30, the bar is 20x20, and the dance floor is approximately 2x5. Yes, you and couple of others can cut it up on the four small squares of wood.

I am convinced that to get into this bar, you have to be one of the following — over 50 years of age or under 21, wearing a tight shirt or a black leather jacket, have one eyebrow, and / or have obscene facial hair. I believe you get a free pitcher of Busch if you have all of the above.

I had a couple of these requirements, so I was all set. A few of my friends and I walked in, and sat at the bar. We said hello to some friends of ours, and waved to the rest of the regulars.

We bought a five–buck pitcher, and went to sit down at the tables. Several months ago, the bar got a new shipment of chairs — padless lawn chairs. Ain't nothing like sucking back some brewskies while sitting on a plastic lawn chair in a bar. I guess it gives you that patio effect people crave when they go to a bar.

Additional entertainment was supplied by karaoke, as a 17– year–old whom I recall being nicknamed Chubb Rock at one time, got up to sing, "Bust a Move" and "Baby Got Back," much to the delight of his other 16–year–old friends that accompanied him.

My friend Lee sang his trademark songs, namely the entire Bon Jovi collection, and Pearl Jam's "Black." Lee's arguably the best singer there, especially when he follows up a song rapped by Chubb Rock. Of course, some guy had the nerve to wail out the two–hour long, "American Pie."

When my friends and I got tired of sitting right in front of the blaring karaoke speaker, we strolled over to the television to watch the football game that was on. Normally, when we're at the bar, we don't watch too long. The big boss of the bar, clad in his skin–tight Izod shirt and his kelly green Dickies every time I'm there, tends to switch channels at the worst times. One night, we were watching a hoop game, and it was a one–point game with less than 10 seconds to play. The boss changed the channel to some early '70s film.

After catching a little of the game, I then had to urinate, so I walked to the bathroom. As I was going, I got a big kick out of reading the walls. For instance, staring me in the face was, "I luv to pee." There were phone numbers, song lyrics, initials and the year the bathroom wall–scribblers wrote it, etc. Reading material at its best.

I was kind of distracted by the 50–plus year old drunk who was screaming, "oooooohhhh yeeeeaaaaahhh" in the urinal next to me. A rather awkward situation when you have an obnoxious, old, obscenely drunk guy pissing next to you, screaming about the pleasure of breaking the seal.

When I left the bathroom, I noticed this dazed kid staring into space as he sat in one of the lawn chairs. Next thing I know, Chubb Rock's sister, who I went to high school with, began to suck face with the stoned kid.

My friends and I continued to look around the bar, trying to finds something even more pathetic to watch. We noticed the bar's lunch special on the bulletin board. The first thing written on the board was, "Fried Pork Chips" for $3, Pork chips. Let's just hope that it was a spelling error.

We decided after seeing the lunch special, we were about ready to leave. As I left the bar, I began to think how my friends and I constantly hack on this place, yet we grudgingly come back on many occasions. And when I go back home on the break, I'll be heading back there.

Besides, I heard those fried pork chips were pretty tasty.

Help end AIDS ignorance

None of my friends have AIDS. None of them.

When I came out to my mom, she had a warning for me: "You're going to have a hard life, kid. Are you prepared to watch all your friends die young, all taken away by AIDS?"

At the time, I got really upset at her. How dare she assume that just because most of my friends are gay they are all going to get AIDS and die? Doesn't she know anything about AIDS?

Wendy Darling

No, my friends are not going to die, I told her. We're smarter than that. I mean, I think we're smarter than most straight people when it comes to these things. Remember back in the mid–eighties when it was "gay = AIDS?" Well, we were there, too, and we remember. No way are we going to be stupid and get AIDS.

When I think of it now, however, I realize that being stupid isn't what gets you AIDS — it's ignorance. Not knowing how it's transmitted or how to protect yourself, either because no one has ever made it clear or because you've never really asked. Thinking it's safe to be unsafe "this time." Feeling sorry for yourself, saying, "Oh, why do I have to live by all these horrible rules?" Deciding that death is preferable to life, and tossing yourself into the mass grave.

So even if some of my friends are "stupid" or all of them are ignorant. They know about the virus and how they can protect themselves. They're not going to walk willingly to their deaths.

Other people don't know as much as my friends, however. Today there are an estimated 122,500 Americans living with AIDS and another million with HIV. It's spreading even among "smart" people — businessmen, middle–class wives, professional athletes. And those who society seems to talk about saving the most — children and the poor — are the ones getting the least attention. They are dying in large numbers, plowed under by the AIDS pandemic.

Sometimes I get really afraid. My friends seem pretty safe now, but will they be able to keep it up? I mean, maybe there'll be that one night when one of them says, "Hey, we don't need that condom tonight, I trust you, I really do. You couldn't have HIV." And assuming they don't have it either, they might just do something that puts them at risk. They might get HIV or give it to someone else. They might die before their time.

And why? Because they couldn't deal with the facts? I don't know about you, but I think that's pretty stupid. Stupid!

I think of my closest friends and then I think of them dead. My heart sinks like a rock, my mind turns into a black cave. Tears roll down my cheeks. Oh, I hope they don't die. Not like that, not when it's something they can conceivable control. Not my friends!

[illegible] that, and it kills me to see people going their merry way — and people not working hard enough to stop them. Tonight at 6:30 people will gather for a candlelight vigil to show support for the fight against AIDS. If you care, come with a candle, and pray that the world takes heart.

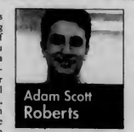
Rejecting the real world

Imagine being cast by a major world wide television network to star in an unscripted real life drama. It gets better; you and seven other individuals would get to live rent–free for six months while having two to three cameras filming your every move for entertainment for the rest of the world.



Adam Scott Roberts

Imagine, this opportunity taking you to the city of London where you would be put up in a posh flat with internationals from other European capital cities like Prague, Stockholm, Berlin and Paris. The fame and notoriety from this experience could open so many doors for you and lead to a road of endless opportunities. And now, imagine standing in front of that door and slamming it shut on all these possibilities and running in the other direction.

Opportunities like this virtually don't come around a second time, and to throw it all away seems, well, actually kind of absurd, right?

Not quite! This so–called amazing opportunity that tons of people would kill for has both its ups and downs. The downs outweigh the ups by astronomical units! This experience would put you in a goldfish bowl for all the world to see and watch your every move and every dilemma that faces you and the impacts these things have on your life.

In this unscripted "real life" documentary, your dirty laundry is hanging outside to dry and being beamed by satellite to every continent on the globe and for what? For the mere entertainment of the viewers at home. There would not be one single thing that the seven strangers you live with wouldn't know about you as well as for the rest of the world. This is a world, although temporary, where there are no secrets.

This seems more than one would actually bargain for. Plus, the problem of not being able to distinguish who likes you for you from the people who like you for who they think you are. Your life would be transformed from being an ordinary American to that of a celebrity where people want to know you when they can reap some sort of benefits from your success.

But come on, it's London, it's rent–free, it's going to be on television for everyone to see. Look at the opportunities that could come about from this, you could get whatever you want. You could become the next CK One model or a guest star on "Melrose" or "90210," you could make the cover of Entertainment Weekly or People. You could shine like a star and this is what you've always wanted.

Slam. You find yourself standing in front of the dark door of opportunity. Leaning against it to keep it shut as people who know you try to and want you to open it up and run on through, and instead you decide not to. You find yourself running the risk of breaching a contract you signed for a 22– episode period of your life for which you would be paid for, and the risk of never having something like this happen again. Ever!

And for reasons of your own you decide that the time is not right at this stage of your life. Heck, you might have already lived in London before and with strangers to boot! However, you did it the real way, unscripted and unfilmed by a camera crew that sticks to you and your life like glue. This is how it is, and this is how things should be. And that is really what is so–called, real.

People think your crazy and heck, you yourself might think the same but hey, it's your life and you do what you want, when you want, and most of all how you want. Your the master of your own ship and always want to ride the sometimes tumultuous high seas and continuously have yourself embarking upon new and exciting endeavors.

The door is now shut. The media has stopped calling. No more ideas of publicists or doing the talk show circuits, no more publicity photo shoots or parties at Planet Hollywoods. Stepping down from the doorway and walking away is one of the hardest and craziest things you've done up until now. You put your head down and . . . (now, you the readers and potential viewers don't know what happens because in fact there are no cameras to capture this).

This is the real world.

Letters to the Editor

STPEC thanks for University support

To the editor:

On behalf of the STPEC program students and staff I would like to extend a belated "thank you" to all of the many people who supported the STPEC program during our temporary fiscal crisis. Budget cuts have threatened many programs at the University, and we hope the determined cooperative effort between students, faculty and staff demonstrated in our time of uncertainty will continue. All of the community members who signed petitions and lobbied on our behalf have helped insure the program will be here for another twenty–one years. Rumors of our death have been greatly exaggerated.

Films

BY JON LUPO • COLLEGIAN STAFF

Picking the best American films was no easy task; it's a bit like entering a jungle where the natives are out to get you. Everybody's a critic when it comes to these kinds of things, so I was determined not to go it alone. I polled six other critics, professors and notable cinephiles for their picks for the ten best American films. The winners are finally in and tallied, but the trip here was ultimately more interesting.

It was a journey fraught with intellectual pitfalls: what, exactly, does "best" mean, for one, and what constitutes an "American" film? The debate raged, especially on the eligibility of films like 2001: A Space Odyssey — filmed largely in Britian but listed on the U.S. film registry — and whether the list should include silent films (some did, others opted to stick with talkies).

So, taking this hardly scientific list as our guide, here's a closer look at the top 10 American films — or 12, if you count ties. And if there's one thing I learned compiling this list...everyone's counting.

1. Citizen Kane
Francois Truffaut credited this 1941 masterwork as having inspired more directorial careers than any other film, while critic Pauline Kael tagged it a "shallow masterpiece." The actual film is somewhere in between — it's hard to tell where the technique stops and the grandstanding begins.

Yet it is hard to argue with the fact that with Kane, Welles and Co. summed up American filmmaking and simultaneously redefined it; weaving the expert (and landmark) photography by Greg Toland with Welles' proven theatrical flair and a successful desire to tell a story and make a film unlike any other.

In one fell swoop, Kane pushed the very boundaries of American film form; its structure, design and impact indicate a desire to usurp the "rules" of Hollywood film — and make up some new ones. And in many ways, Kane did re–set the standard for "greatness," even if it took years for this to sink in.

Amid all of the film's superb creativity, innovation and individuality, Welles managed to deliver a remarkable performance in front of the camera as well. In perhaps Kane's most overlooked facet, Welles impresses as the aging, corpulent, shadow–of–his–former–self Kane, a role that is both superbly played and eerily prophetic. Like the film itself, Welles was audaciously ahead of his time.

2. Singin' in the Rain
Writers Adolf Green and Betty Comden were given the seemingly impossible task of writing a musical around songs contained in producer Arthur Freed's expansive catalog — most of which were used before in other movies. What they came up with was nothing short of the most dazzling, euphoric musical of all time, period.

There's Gene Kelly and Stanley Donen's peerless choreography — a fantastical sampling of various period dancing styles — along with a witty screenplay and some of the cinema's most memorable musical numbers, including Donald O'Conner's maniac, slapstick brilliance in "Make 'Em Laugh" and the show–stopping finale, "Broadway Ballet." And then there's the exhilarating title tune, sung with such dizzyingly happy fervor it led to jury member Tim Sharp supposing (erroneously?) that Rain is "essentially pornographic in its presentation of overflowing sexuality and endless orgasms." Indeed.

People and Pop Culture in the News

Oprah has more than Ricki Lake's growing popularity to contend with. Her ex-publicist is slapping Harpo, her pride and joy, with a $200,000 lawsuit. Colleen Raleigh is seeking severance and back pay due to Harpo's alleged less than professional atmosphere. Next on "Oprah:" Talk Show Hosts Who Are Exploited for Money. Oh no, the audacity of some people!

"Party Of Five" is causing a ruckus on FOX's Monday night line up steadily climbing the ratings. Scott Wolf who plays Bailey on the show, can also be seen on the big screen. The 26-yr. old will star in Double Dragons with Alyssa Milano ("Who's The Boss"). The two got quite cozy and even engaged, but like the video game, the romance was short lived and the two have separated (sob).

Ever want to remodel but not know who to call for that extra piece de resistance? Why not...Cher? That's right, no longer content with flashing her buttocks at randy sailors, Cher has started her own line of home furnishings called Sanctuary. Two million dollars has been invested in this precarious deal, but she isn't worrying. Her astrologer predicted it would be a bumpy start. Wow.

And speaking of astrologers the all knowing Nostradamous was born in December 1500. In 1551 he made the following prediction: "When millenacum is six years nigh/ The gladyatore Orthenal shall flye/ On bronco whyte as snowhare's fleece/ And wood of brent shall have no peace." Don't get it? Okay, well think Tropicana.

Everybody loves a sequel, right? Well, three action packed movies already have scripts in the making. Speed, The Fugitive II, and Cliffhanger II are the three lucky winners. Keanu Reeves' character may end up married, Harrison Ford and Tommy Lee Jones haven't even been asked, and Sylvester Stallone is only being considered for his role. What was that phrase about letting sleeping dogs...or action movies lie?

Here is a Muppet News flash: David Brinkley, 74-year old ABC newscaster plans to retire after the 1996 elections. More news later.

It's time to think of that special gift for the one you love so here are some ideas, provided you have the cash and the motivation.

Sali'n'Pepa is jumping on the fitness bandwagon and releasing their own funky exercise video for all you who want to "push it good." Neiman Marcus of Los Angeles has something for the Italian in you. For a sweet $7,400 you can purchase your own electric gondola, "Oh honey! Just what the hot tub needed!" And for the truly rich and famous Harrod's of London has a Virtual Reality game for ta da! $70,000!

Books — Diana Gabaldon

Nowadays, historical romances are a dime a dozen. Authors continue to pump out 200 pages of fluff with little substance and lots of sex. How many times can a reader stand the phrase "throbbing manhood?" One author, however, has managed to recapture the glory of the historical romance.

Diana Gabaldon's trilogy Outlander, Drangonfly In Amber and her third installment Voyager are three books well worth a read. Claire Randell travels back through time to 18th Century Scotland where Bonnie Prince Charlie is trying to take the throne. There she meets and marries Jamie Fraser, a Highlander only to be thrown back into her time to bear his child alone, thinking he's been killed in the famous Battle of Culloden. The three books carry on Claire's tale that spans over two decades with rich, colorful language and a cohesive plot line.

Gabaldon writes from a refreshing first person point of view and although each novel is well over 1000 pages, all the books are well worth the time. Plus, they are now available in paperback.

Radio — WRSI

For those who are from WFNX–land near Boston and those near Providence that got a steady dosage of WBRU every day, no doubt go through radio withdrawal out here.

It can get a little frustrating listening to WHMP's constant barrage of Ace of Base, Babyface and other assorted "slow jams," like Peter Frampton's "Show Me The Way" and Pink Floyd's "Another Brick in the Wall pt. II" on any of the seemingly endless array of classic rock stations. Then there's WAAF's attempts at wit utilizing toilet humor and a constant barrage of AC/DC and Alice in Chains.

Well, fret no more, Alterna–people, WRSI in Hartford, (104.1 FM) though a little difficult to receive at times, is now playing a steady diet of alternative music.

And while the playlist deives even less into pre–1990 alternative than "Alternative Nation" does, it's a welcome diversion from an area that has "Oh, What A Night" filling the air most of the time.

Books — Disclosure

If you're looking for a fascinating tale of deceit and role reversal that won't take you months to read, pick up a copy of Michael Crichton's Disclosure, now out in paperback. It's an intriguing story which details a week in the life of Tom Sanders, an executive with a high–tech company in Seattle who is sexually harassed by his boss, who happens to be his ex–girlfriend from many years ago.

Crichton carries the reader through the events of the week in rapid fashion, as even the technical details of the plot fly by without difficulty. Crichton's topic is very timely, considering that harassment in the workplace is becoming more and more difficult to define. The gimmick of reversing the conventional roles of harassment works well and sheds interesting light on the issue.

Disclosure will make its debut on the big screen on Dec. 9, with Michael Douglas and Demi Moore in starring roles. The novel should easily make the transition to film, but try and check out the book anyway. Disclosure is a fast and furious read.

Songstress Vanessa Williams grows up

THE SWEETEST DAYS
Vanessa Williams
Wings/Mercury

Somethings just get better as time goes by and Vanessa Williams is living testament to this. Her third album, The Sweetest Days is an intricate mixture of musical genres that run the gambit from Brazilian pop to subtle gospel songs all celebrating love and life.

Williams showed the world that she wasn't one to leave the lime light without a fight. Four years after her abdicating as Miss America in 1983, Williams signed onto Wings/Mercury and recorded her debut album, The Right Stuff which went gold in 1988. This launched her into the music world and in 1991, she created her second album, The Comfort Zone.

It went platinum and became a multi–million seller. The single "Saved The Best for Last" stayed number one on the Billboard Charts for several weeks. The single also won her the two New York Music Awards for "Best R&B Single" and "Best Single of the Year" in 1992. In 1993, Williams won the Billboard Music Award for #1 Adult Contemporary Single for "Love Is," her duet with Brian McKnight along with the B'Nai Birth Creative Achievement Award.

As a mother, actress and singer Williams experiences a wide range of emotions that reveal themselves in The Sweetest Days. She recorded the album inbetween rehearsals for Broadway's Kiss of the Spiderwoman where she earned critical acclaim as femme fatale lead Aurora/Spiderwoman. Williams worked with producer Gerry Brown and Babyface, who helped Boyz II Men with their second album, Boyz II Men II. Like Boyz II Men, Williams has matured with past experience and produced a solid album.

Many songs catch your attention at first listen. "Betcha Never" is a slow mambo–type song that tells the story about an overlooked lover who finds someone of her own. The title track is the kind of plain ballad that made Williams famous. "Higher Ground" lends itself a gospel blues type feel to it invoking spirituality and faith backed by a guitar and piano.

"My approach in terms of a production and my vocal is: no gimmicks. Just, what's the melody line, a relaxed atmosphere and a relaxed approach to life," said Williams in a press release.

Some songs fall to the wayside with some of the standard sounding dance beats and bouncy rhythm and a few tracks might seem like she is stuck on singing love songs. "The Way You Love" and "Moon Over Paris."

But, the tribute to Ella Fitzgerald, "Ellamental" and the remake of Sting's "Sister Moon" keep the album well above the water line.

"I am very proud of the direction that my music has taken and I feel that I really matured artistically on this record . . . Most of my fans are growing older as I am, and there is no reason to run away from that," said Williams in a press release.

The Sweetest Days reveals a more calm Williams who knows she is an established performer with talent. It is an album of simple songs and beautiful melodies that are poignant and soulful with a touch of creativity she has mastered beautifully. With insight and maturity, Willams has produced an album well worth a listen. B+

Tracy talks turkey and television

I'm worn out. With the whole November sweeps thing wrapping up, and the holiday season swinging into full gear, it seems like every show lately has been a "World Premiere" or extravaganza of some kind. All the networks seem to be begging, pleading, breathlessly groping for my attention with their jam–packed programming, and I'm getting drained.

Tube Notes
By Tracy Bonel

Each night I'd favor one channel or another optimistically, only to eventually discover that what is advertised as a 'special' show, usually turns out to be quite ordinary in real life. For the most part, this has been a disheartening few weeks — however, I've kept plodding along in the hopes that I would find the few shows out there deserving of an intelligent audience. Needless to say, it hasn't been easy.

I guess I should start out by reviewing the Macy's Thanksgiving Day Parade, since this is the first year I actually got up in time for the festivities in . . . well, ever.

I only caught the last half–hour, but speaking as one who can only watch huge, ridiculous–looking balloons for so long, thirty minutes was plenty. But even though I'm not exactly a fan of the whole thing, I still think the parade should be televised — it could teach people the true meaning of Thanksgiving. Because when I was seeing those thousands of spectators, jammed together like sardines in the middle of New York City, forced to confront the bitter cold and boring high school bands on a day when they should have been at home eating turkey . . well, I personally felt really thankful that I was not among them.

There were several other shows that caught my attention over the Thanksgiving break–probably the best of which was CBS' annual rebroadcast of "The Wizard of Oz," the classic 1939 musical with a parting message that I have yet to completely understand. It has something to do with finding happiness within yourself, and not running away from home . . . I think.

Anyway, I also saw CBS' moderately entertaining "Late Show with David Letterman Video Special" which featured some of the talk show's funnier moments from the past year (I particularly liked seeing Dave and Zsa Zsa Gabor driving around L.A. in a convertable, sampling various fast food restaurants). It was good, but I still feel like now that Letterman's so popular, he's become a bit too slick and has lost his cutting–edge appeal. Lately I've preferred watching Jay Solid coaches in UVa's Jeff Jones and UM's Gary Williams. Both have knocked off now-No. 1 Massachusetts in consecutive NCAA tournament second rounds.

One glaring difference, though, is while the Terrapins rise and fall with the play of center sensation Joe Smith, the Cavaliers live and die with guard Cory Alexander, who will play in the NBA next year.

From Providence to the NBA to Kentucky. Rick Pitino has proven he's a winner. His teams win, as well, and along with Arkansas, the Wildcats are the class of the Southeastern Conference.

It is time for Rodrick Rhodes to step it up a few notches and reach the upper echelon, where he belongs. Kentucky and Arkansas both have the depth to put two SEC teams in the Final Four for the second straight year.

Florida, Alabama and Mississippi State all could challenge for the SEC title. Remember the name Erick Dampier. The 6-foot-11 sophomore center for State was the leading rebounder in the SEC in 1993-94 (8.7 rpg) to go along with his 11.9 points per game.

Games to Watch

Massachusetts at Maryland, Dec. 10 — The storylines are numerous. Quite possible could have the No. 1 team as the underdog.

Kentucky at Arkansas, Jan. 29 — The Razorbacks are always tough at home. Can Pitino get his troops primed in two months?

Duke at UCLA, Feb. 26 — By this time in the season, Coach K will have the Blue Devils in the Top 10. Will Bruins Coach Jim Harrick be able to do the same for his team?

Final Four Predictions — Massachusetts vs. Kentucky, Arkansas vs. Cincinnati.

perimeter-based. However, even with NBA caliber big men (Brian Williams, Sean Rooks and Tom Tolbert) as the focus, the 'Cats have underachieved.

Coach Bill Freider will lead his Arizona State squad to the NCAA tournament for the first time since '91. Forward Mario Bennett has an NBA game, complete with rebounding and interior scoring skills. Add California to the list of teams you won't want to play by February.

Kansas is one team that nobody wants to play early in the season, a testament to Coach Roy Williams. The Jayhawks may not have the talent they've had in past seasons, but Williams may be the nation's top coach. He potentially has a stellar backcourt with sophomore Jacque Vaughn and Cal- transfer Jerod Haase. The electrifying Vaughn should find Haase, who will be a deadly outside shooter, often. The center combination will be strong with senior Greg Ostertag and freshman Raef LaFrentz.

Bryant Reeves will challenge Ostertag for supremacy in the middle in the Big Eight. His Oklahoma State team will again be a legitimate tourney contender. If senior guard Randy Rutherford can pick up the scoring slack, then the Cowboys can be a Top 25 team.

Cincinnati may once again have what it takes to come out of the Great Midwest conference and make that Final Four run. Bob Huggins has great size and a veteran team returning. Star forward David Vaughn leads a strong Memphis team that figures to challenge the for this conference crown.

Games to Watch

Temple at Massachusetts, Jan. 21. Everyone remembers the festivities after last year's Mullins battle. The nation will be watching the coaching duel of John Calipari and John Chaney.

St. John's at Michigan, Jan. 29. The Red Storm and fabulous freshmen Felipe Lopez and Zendon Hamilton battle with fellow phenoms Ward and Taylor.

Maryland at Cincinnati, Feb. 19. A great contest between two athletic teams. Both teams play with reckless abandon, featuring a take-on-all-comers attitude.

Final Four predictions: Massachusetts vs. Villanova, Arkansas vs. North Carolina.

mous walls of Babylon (immortalized in Paolo and Vittorio Taviani's 1987 Good Morning Babylon). But it's the film's smaller moments and motifs that linger — the varied faces of women or the detailed close-ups of hands.

Though much maligned at the time — the film's four interwoven stories proved too complex for moviegoers — in retrospect, Intolerance seems a greater triumph than Nation. In addition to the film's landmark editing and manipulation of each period's misc-en-scene, Griffith manages to be both blunt and subtle at the same time...a feat lost on lesser directors (say, Oliver Stone) who try to merge heavy social comment with epic entertainment.

Raging Bull

A critic once mused that thinking Raging Bull is just about boxing is like saying Vertigo is just about a man who is afraid of heights. Which isn't to say Bull is not a boxing picture; it is, but it's also a film noir & biopic on the very fringes of these genres. Bull is about fighting too, battling inner demons and struggling with questions of self-identity and self-redemption — an Italian-American passion play acted out in bold, brutal, devastating strokes.

It's a tour-de-force all around (in the least hyperbolic and honest way), with Robert DeNiro's psychotically obsessive performance (he gained over 40 pounds for the role) matched only by Scorsese's own compulsive directorial style.

Both reached their creative zeniths during the brilliant fight sequences. Filmed in a highly expressionist manner — from the precise point of view shots to the hissing and clicking of the old Graphex cameras, these scenes fuse horror and pathos, guilt and redemption. Amazingly enough, the film then works to make them one and the same.

4. The Godfather & The Godfather Part II

Here are two monumental films — epics lensed two years apart — that speak as two sides of the same coin. Now, long after "make him an offer he can't refuse" has become a slightly tired pop cultural idiom, the first two Godfather films still manage to conjure up warm memories of cold- blooded killers trapped by their destinies and Gordon Willis' exquisite light vs. dark cinematography.

Well, Part I anyway. Whereas the original Godfather makes it claim as a rich narrative — a Shakespeare play in gangster drag — and a violent parable of the American Dream, Part II eclipses the dream and turns it into a nightmare. Demythologizing the first film with its sinister portrait of Michael Corleone's lust for power, Part II combines flashbacks of young Vito's rise and Michael's descent into a hell of his own making.

Director Francis Ford Coppola daringly eschews the notion of just retreading part one; instead, he uses the sequel to not only create a vividly frightening crime film and a tragic family tale but to comment upon itself. Containing some of cinema's richest performances and most stirringly told narrative, The Godfather and The Godfather Part II look into the heart of darkness and find out it's a mirror cracked.

5. 2001: A Space Odyssey

"Somewhere between hypnotic and immensely boring" wrote Renata Adler of Stanely Kubrick's illusory ode to the meaning of technology...and life. What, exactly, that meaning is remains elusive, as does the loose, neo- metaphysical narrative.

But as jury member Don Eric Levine points out, 2001 is less a straightforward story than "a series of stunning tableaux." It's the film's stunning image-making — alternately obscure (almost infuriatingly so) and defiantly sublime — that makes 2001 a modern classic matched only by its decidedly Kubrick-ian blend of symbolism and satire.

Containing arguably the single greatest cut in cinema history (the swirling bone turns into a drifting space ship), 2001 is the kind of head trip only Kubrick — and cinema — could deliver.

6. Casablanca

When people talk about Hollywood not making 'em like they used to, they're usually thinking of Casablanca. Finely crafted in rich Hollywood style, this film supersedes The Godfather for sheer pop cultural density — people remember things about the movie ("Play it again, Sam") that never even happened. But how come this routine Warner Bros. potboiler — named Casablanca in an effort to capitalize on recent political intrigue in the African way- station — became the classic romance of the studio system?

Credit truly legendary performances by Humphrey Bogart, Ingrid Bergman and the slippery Claude Rains; crisp, efficient direction by Michael Curtiz; moody cinematography by Arthur Edeson; a razor-sharp script by Julius J. and Philip G. Epstein, and Howard Koch plus Max Steiner's lush score and the unforgettable strains of "As Time Goes By." Embodying and excelling within the definition of a "team effort," Casablanca rounds up the usual suspects — and showcases them at their very best.

7. Nashville

While Pauline Kael had qualms about Citizen Kane, she had no such reservations in proclaiming Robert Altman's Nashville "a pure emotional high...you don't come down when the picture is over, you take it with you." And that was only after seeing the rough cut.

Nashville: Altman assembles a photo album spilling over with snapshots of a nation rife with prickly dissension but still vibrantly, unstoppably alive.

Nashville is a vivid, living piece of Americana, a film about the red, white and blues of our nation — and all the shades in between. Altman concocts a sprawling canvas, a patch-quilt of dreamers and schemers and embraces them both with a kind of unequivocal, populist fervor. You'll want to see it for its eclectic cast (Geraldine Chaplin, Keith Carradine, Keenan Wynn, Karen Black, Lily Tomlin, among many others) and its erratic musical numbers (which get better, or maybe just easier to stand with time).

But it's Nashville's mark as a the filmic version of serendipity, where around every corner there's something new to marvel at, that emerges as the film's major triumph. And under the banner of country music and politics — two assertively American pastimes — Altman assembles a photo album spilling over with snapshots of a nation rife with prickly dissension but still vibrantly, unstoppably alive.

Raging Bull: An Italian-American passion play acted out in bold, brutal, devastating strokes.

8. North by Northwest

If the sum of all Hitchcock's fears manifested themselves in the obsession-drenched Vertigo, this comic-adventure follow-up is the one that fully exploits Hitch's sneaky sense of humor and elegant gamesmanship. (Incidentally, all three would merge together in his next film, Psycho.) Funny, suave and thrilling, North by Northwest not only showcases Hitch and star Cary Grant in top form, it set the standard for the frothy adventure franchise that became the James Bond series.

North careens off a premise so incomprehensibly improbable, it's safer (and much more fun) to just sit back and enjoy the dazzling set pieces — there's Grant being pursued by the crop duster, Grant's (magi-native exit from an auction hall, Grant and Eva Marie Saint climbing down Mount Rushmore, among others. Add in the sophisticated James Mason and the dastardly Martin Landau as the villains and you've got a comic thriller unlike any other, one that will keep you wondering how they ever pulled it off so well.

9. The Searchers

Light pours in around the silhouette of a woman as a cabin door opens. Two hours later the door closes, plunging the viewer into darkness again. Those are the opening and closing moments of John Ford's seminol Western — one of the most influential films ever to grace the silver screen.

This is the culmination of Ford's expansive career — a prolific filmography that includes My Darling Clementine, Stagecoach and The Grapes of Wrath — weaving Ford-ian themes with masterful study of obsession, psychological torment, racism and the violent underpinnings of the settling of America.

Manhattan: A decidedly '70s flip on Chaplin's classic City Lights, a rhapsody (and riddle) in black and white.

The story itself is a bit problematic, involving John Wayne (his finest performance ever) as an ex-Confederate soldier tirelessly (and compulsively) spending years searching for his niece (Natalie Wood), who was kidnapped by Indians. Yet The Searchers thrives best in its non-spoken moments. Ford is the master of the poetic image, and his frequent, expert shift of point of view is at the heart of this film's success.

Contrasting with the simple mural tones of earlier Westerns (High Noon for one, which is a classic for entirely different reasons), The Searchers dives deep into its ideological contradictions and ambiguities, delivering a film oft imitated (see Taxi Driver) but never equalled.

Sunrise

"This story of a man and his wife is of nowhere and everywhere," the film's opening title reads, "you might hear it anywhere and at any time." So begins F.W. Murnau's silent masterpiece, a visual poem singled out for its rare beauty and almost ethereal nature. After directing several noted German productions (like Nosferatu), Murnau came to America and made Sunrise at a time when both he and the silent film were at their creative peaks.

Fleshing out the incomplex story of a love triangle with lyrical flourishes and a loving aura, Murnau fully utilized the silent film form. Simple motifs, like literal juxtapositions, were employed with little fanfare and pretension, allowing for a delicately sensual experience. Janet Gaynor won a Best Actress Academy Award and the film's photographers, Karl Struss and Charles Rosher copped the first Oscar for cinematography for this unique film, a stunner that blends a German visual sense with Hollywood romanticism.

10. Manhattan

In the glorious opening to Woody Allen's crowning achievement, the camera lingers on the many contrasting images that make up the soul of Manhattan — garbage piled on one side street, lovers swooning in the shadow of the George Washington Bridge to a pulsing Gershwin score.

Like the isle itself, the characters who live there are full of contradictions, careening through their lives without a parachute. Allen creates yet another impressive ensemble of the New York intelligencia — jilted, baby-faced lovers off to study in London, unfaithful spouses, slightled intellectuals full of "fashionable pessimism" searching for last-minute reprieves (maybe) — and deconstructs their world with humor, satire and strings-attached romanticism.

Superlative performances by Allen, Diane Keaton (far away from Annie Hall), Mariel Hemingway and Michael Murphy and sumptuous photography from Gordon Willis makes Manhattan a decidedly '70s flip on Chaplin's classic City Lights, a rhapsody (and riddle) in black and white.

Queensryche's latest a return to progressive roots

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

QUEENSRYCHE
Promised Land
EMI Records

In the last few years, what has been best known of the Seattle music scene is the ever present style of grunge. But what is not usually talked about is the artists and bands that laid the foundation for this business-based, musical explosion. The omnipotently ephemeral guitar majesty of the one and only Jimi Hendrix, and the straight rock of the Wilson sisters of Heart, did not hurt in showcasing the area's bankable qualities.

Another band that can be added to the list of Seattle forerunners is Queensryche, the first real hard rock band to emerge from this area. From their self-titled debut EP in 1983, this 12-year veteran has now come off a four-year hiatus from the recording studio with their sixth major release, Promised Land.

One thing is for sure, if you are a long time fan of this band, you will be astonished, but if your catalogue only consists of the 1990 release Empire, you are in for a ride into the introspective dark side of human nature.

The CD opens with the instrumental "9:28am," and blends into the rocker, and first single, "I Am I." You can picture with your mind's eye lead singer Geoff Tate's devilish smile as he sings, "So this is the way the game is played, you can leave now..."

Progressive is the best word that would describe the title track, in which the band further pursues its Floyd-ian influences, and puts them on their own plateau. The tradcmark rhythm section of Eddie Jackson (bass) and Scott Rockenfield (drums) highlight this track, as new tricks learned on their hiatus brings a different feel to the familiar sound.

But what stands out above the rest is the final track "Someone Else." For the first time in their history, strict solo piano is used, while the unique song writing of Chris Degarmo still shines through. Geoff Tate stakes his claim as one of the best singers in the industry, as this song puts the whole release into perspective.

Promised Land delivers, where the mainstream Empire left a little to be desired. Taking attributes of their best releases, Queensryche opens a new door to their succesful career with a work that impresses. You will not find "Jet City Woman" on this CD, and the lyrics of "Someone Else" tells the story. "Here I stand at the crossroads edge/ Afraid to reach out for eternity/ One step, when I look down/ I see someone else not me." A-

Leno sharpen up his style, rather than staying with Dave's repetitive, and sometimes annoying shtick.

Speaking of shtick, Jerry Seinfeld really could have used some when he narrated NBC's recent tribute to Abbott and Costello. The program was okay, if you're a fan of the comedy team, but Seinfeld was uncharacteristically stiff — he sounded like some nervous, gangling adolescent forced to read his term paper aloud in English class. From now on, Jerry had better stick with stand-up — playing the straight man is definitely not for him.

There were also lots of strange made-for-TV movie offerings last week. In "The Rockford Files: I Still Love L.A.," James Garner and company from the mid-'70s' series return to investigate a crime oddly reminiscent of the Rodney King, Menendez, and O.J. Simpson cases, but are continuously interrupted by various riots, fires and earthquakes.

Another classic TV resurrection, "Bionic Ever After" featured Lee Majors and Lindsay Wagner reprising their roles as part human-part machine superheroes who finally decide to marry after a mere 20 years of casual dating. Talk about a fear of commitment — I mean, it's not like either of them had many attractive cyborgs to choose from.

I even witnessed part of Fox's ludicrous "Madonna: Innocence Lost." It seems to me that if the network really wanted to make this picture into something, they should have dumped that unknown actress and cast a feisty female impersonator in the lead to liven things up. Also, they needed some manic, weasel-like, Eric Roberts-type guy to play Sean Penn, who could have wandered around beating the stuffing out of random passersby whenever things got dull. Unfortunately, whoever made this bio didn't have Madonna's sense of adventure, that's for sure.

And, finally, I did have one truly redeeming viewing experience last week, which was found in CBS' holiday showing of "Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer." Good old Rudolph, that champion of misfits, managed to lift my spirits and renew my faith in the potential greatness of television. So I guess I found at least one special show during sweeps month, after all.

Maltin's 'Movie Guide' goes CD-ROM

By Scott Williams
Associated Press

NEW YORK - "Entertainment Tonight" movie critic Leonard Maltin readily admits to being a low-tech person in a high-tech world.

"It's not easy," he acknowledged. "I get dragged into these new technologies and have my fun."

That's especially true of the 1995 edition of his "Movie and Video Guide," which is available this Christmas season in a boxed set: One 2-inch-thick paperback, and two floppy diskettes of the "electronic edition."

"It wasn't my idea," he said cheerfully. "The book's actually been on CD-ROM for 3 years."

High-tech computerheads can find Maltin's book in the Microsoft "Cinemania" CD-ROM package. The electronic edition's lower-tech diskettes are intended for a different kind of user, Maltin said. "Lots of people don't have CD-ROM drives, or they're afraid of the new technology and equipment - or maybe they're low-tech like me," he said. "But EVERYBODY who has a computer these days has a hard drive."

Yeah, but you also need eight megabytes of free memory on your hard disk drive, an 80386 (or faster) processor and Microsoft's Windows software, to get access to all 19,000 entries on film, home video, and made-for-TV movies.

(A version for Apple's Macintosh computers is due early next year.)

OK, if I need eight megabytes on my IBM-compatible computer's hard drive, a 386 or faster chip, and Windows software, why not just pick up the book?

In the book, "You can't look up every film set in Denver or every film about robots," Maltin said. "You can now.

"And there are lots of places to look up the films of Fred Astaire. But there're not a lot of places to look up the films of Edgar Buchanan or Strother Martin, or even contemporary actors like Christopher Walken and Johnny Depp."

Low-tech Maltin permits himself a little enthusiasm for his electronic edition's ability to use multiple criteria in a single search:

"How many films," Maltin begins, "did Jack Lemmon make for director Billy Wilder between 1960 and 1970, that were nominated for Oscars and get at least three stars in my book? That's one keystroke."

Maltin, the former editor-publisher of Film Fan Monthly magazine, was already a noted film historian, writer and lecturer when he assumed his first full-time critic's job at "E.T." in 1982.

He since has syndicated his "Leonard Maltin on Video" radio spots and has written and produced many TV specials about films and filmmaking.

"I'm in every medium known to mankind!" he rails in mock despair.

"Apple bought my book to put on a card for the Newton

(notepad-sized handheld computer)," Maltin said. "Take it to the video store, and say, 'Gee, I liked Unforgiven.' I want to see another Western.' ... Or 'I want another Warren Beatty movie.'" Each year Maltin updates his 25-year-old film "database," to prepare for next year's edition of the guide. A high-tech update, right?

Well, no. "The publisher makes a set of full-sized page proofs, with margins," Maltin said. "When we're making an addition to a page, we take a ballpoint pen and write in the margin. ... "I say to my computer friends, 'If you have a faster, more efficient, more clear-cut way to do this with a machine, I'll do it,'" Maltin said. "But there isn't." Maltin grins mischievously and speaks further.

"We have also been known to use hold your breath! - Scotch tape."

Numbers are now there for Tom Sheehan

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

Tom Sheehan started every game for the University of Massachusetts hockey team last year.

That was then, this is now. When UMass made its Hockey East debut on October 22, the East Warwick, R.I. native was nowhere to be found. Scratched, benched, not going to play.

Coach Joe Mallen had a host of heavily sought recruits and transfers to fill Sheehan's skates.

After nine games, few Minutemen have excelled to the degree that this undersized LaSalle Academy (R.I.) product has. Sheehan trails only Rob Bonneau on the team scoring chart with two goals (on six shots) and three assists. With Bonneau, Mike Evans and Gerry Cahill suspended for tomorrow's game against Merrimack, the sophomore forward will have come full circle — from no time to crunch time.

"Looking back [to the opener], I would say that's the best thing that's happened to me," Sheehan said. "Sitting out a game was the worst experience of my life."

A recap of Sheehan's prep background underlines his terrible disappointment. He starred for his father, Tom Sr., at prestigious LaSalle Academy from 1987–91, which knocked off perennial powerhouse Mount St. Charles in three of four regular season meetings in Sheehan's senior year.

LaSalle also toppled Catholic Memorial in 1991, a year which saw the Knights, widely regarded as the nation's best team, capture the Massachusetts Division 1A Championship.

Though Sheehan skated frequently on a line with Evans and Tom Perry in UMass' return to the hockey fore 13 months ago, "the numbers weren't there," Sheehan said. He did in fact score eight goals and add nine assists, good for 17 points, tying him with Tony Giusto for seventh best on the team. But with the rise of UMass' competition, Sheehan's production has risen as well.

"I think overall my commitment has been a lot bigger than last year," Sheehan said. "I really dedicated myself this summer, lifting weights and running."

PAUL BILODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Tom Sheehan is the second-leading scorer on the University of Massachusetts men's hockey team, totaling two goals [six shots] and three assists.

Only 5-foot-9 and 170 pounds, Sheehan has proven he can handle the nightly wear and tear of a Hockey East schedule. But he has saved his best work for outside the conference. UMass faced mostly scattershot Division III opponents in 1993–94 but in one of its few Division I challenges with Army on Jan. 29, Sheehan potted the game winner of the 4–3 triumph, UMass' first over a top level squad.

The Minutemen are winless in 1994–95, and without Sheehan, they might not have a point. Trailing Air Force 3–2 in the third period on Nov. 12, Sheehan knotted the contest that earned UMass its first point of the season.

In UMass' heartbreaking 5–4 setback to Providence on Oct. 29, Sheehan discovered his worth.

"It was my first game back, and in the third period I set up [Blair] Wagar for the go-ahead goal [that gave UMass a 4–3 lead]," Sheehan said. "I think from there on, confidence wise, that's when I realized I was playing well. I think it just snowballed; thank God, I hope it keeps going."

Sheehan's route to UMass was not as short as the brief commute from East Warwick to Amherst. He played one year at Taft Academy, and another with the Cornwall Colts of the Central Junior Hockey League, which also lists UMass' Chris Fawcett among its alumni.

For his efforts at LaSalle, Sheehan was invited to participate in the Hockey Night In Boston tournament, in which anyone who's anyone in southern New England high school hockey gets a chance to strut his stuff.

"You look forward to playing against the best people, just to see where you stand," Sheehan said of HNIB. Where did Sheehan stand? Pretty tall. He was named the Rhode Island Offensive MVP and Mr. Hustle of the tourney.

Coaches of every big name program were on hand to witness Sheehan's show, including Mallen, then a Boston College assistant. But it was not until the day after UMass hired Mallen that he contacted Sheehan in his frenetic task of assembling a roster. Sheehan found the campus appealing during a visit and subsequently committed. Though Mallen agrees that missing this year's opener was a much needed wake-up call for Sheehan, the call Mallen made to Sheehan in April of 1993 was also the right one.

Padilla is still a starter

Williams to return from suspension

After serving his three-game suspension invoked by Coach John Calipari for team academic violations, senior guard Mike Williams will be back in the Minuteman lineup Saturday against Kansas.

Padilla, who performed well in the win over Arkansas, will remain the starter, while Williams will come off the bench.

Celebrity Status

With the current publicity surrounding the UMass basketball team, the players have been popular figures on campus.

"I walked into class after the Arkansas game and I got a standing ovation," said sophomore center Marcus Camby. "It felt good to have the student support."

Early birds

In preparation for the Kansas game, the Minutemen have been hitting the court for practice at 5:30 a.m.

Calipari likes the early morning practices for several reasons.

"It allows us to get up and think basketball," Calipari said. "It frees [the players'] day so they can take care of [school work].

"It will make us mentally tougher. We've been going hard. I've been pretty pleased."

Humble pie for Vitale

It is a rare occurrence, but Lou Roe did get in the last word with ESPN analyst Dick Vitale.

Following UMass' startling upset of Arkansas, Roe went straight to Vitale.

"When he did his ESPN College Preview here, he put Corliss [Williamson] on his first All-America team and me on his second team.

"He said that he gave it to Corliss because he was [a member of a team of] national champs, but he said if I proved him wrong on national TV, he'd say that I was the best," said Roe.

"After the game I went up to him and said 'Well, say it.'"

Following Tuesday's Connecticut–Duke game, Vitale proposed a UConn–UMass matchup in the new Shawmut Center.

"You take Calipari. You take Calhoun, and you play that first college basketball game in the Shawmut Center."

Chasing Pitino

While Kentucky Coach Rick Pitino is known more for his coaching than his playing, the former Minuteman point guard is fifth in career assists at UMass with 329.

Patino will likely fall to sixth on that list sometime during Saturday's game, as senior Derek Kellogg only needs three to pass him.

Improving on Free Throws

After last year's abysmal performance in which they shot 18–37 from the free throw line, the Minutemen have made improving that statistic a priority over the off-season.

Their hard work was evident last Friday, as the Minutemen hit 40 of 50 in the season opener against the Razorbacks.

Roe, who had a particularly tough night shooting, 7–20, altered his approach at the line.

"I just shot a lot of them," Roe said. "I moved my position on the line. I just made a little adjustment and I feel a lot more comfortable."

Sick bay

The Minutemen have been plagued by sickness during the past few days. Dana Dingle, Derek Kellogg and Lou Roe have all missed practice this week due to illness. All three are expected to be in action against the Jayhawks.

Pressure on Lopez, Syracuse can go far

Teams across the nation have taken that first step on the Road to the Final Four, a long and winding one which ends up in Seattle next April. Until then, though, there will be many a highlight in the world of college basketball, with challengers coming from around the country.

If one is wondering why a lot of coaches want to change the eligibility of freshmen in college basketball, look no further than the treatment of phenom Felipe Lopez of St. John's. He has already appeared on the cover of Sports Illustrated, has been the lead story on Sportscenter, as well as the subject of many comparisons, namely the one to Michael Jordan.

The pressure for any freshman in college is immense — when felt by a first-year college athlete born to be a star it is another thing. How can anyone expect Lopez to ease into his first semester at St. John's when media from all over the world is constantly poking around and asking for interviews?

ART STAPLETON JR.
ON COLLEGE BASKETBALL

Why not do what the National Association of Basketball Coaches wants? Make freshmen ineligible and compensate for it by giving them an extra year of eligibility, allowing the athlete five years at school, with the full four years to play hoops.

As far as on the court, Lopez is still learning how to play college basketball. With Lopez and big-man Zendon Hamilton, the Red Storm will be a force — next year. Enough already with St. John's challenging for the Big East championship.

Syracuse will go as far as Lawrence Moten and John Wallace take the Orange. If Moten is streaky this season, Syracuse will be, too. Wallace still has yet to give any good reason to why he wears the No. 44 once donned by Derrick Coleman. If the Orange have to rely on their coaching from Jim Boeheim, they are guaranteed to do one thing — disappoint, just like Boeheim.

Connecticut's Jim Calhoun must be enjoying Massachusetts' reign at the top of the polls. Those phone calls from Storrs, Conn., should come flooding into the UMass Athletic Department any time now, inquiring about a game or two in the upcoming years.

With the talent the Huskies have, they are going to need that type of competition. Ray Allen and Doron Sheffer are destined to shine in 1995, but playing the Lafayette's of the world isn't going to get it done. Tuesday's win over Duke appears strong, but take a look at the Blue Devils.

One of the best coaches in America, Mike Krzyzewski, has a lot of inexperienced talent to work with: Duke will take its lumps in the country's best league, the Atlantic Coast Conference.

What else is new? North Carolina is strong again. The Tar Heels will beat up on people with their frontcourt of Rasheed Wallace, Jerry Stackhouse and Pat Sullivan, while struggling against others because of an inconsistent backcourt of on-again, off-again, on-again Donald Williams and Jeff McInnis. Dean Smith will no doubt miss Derrick Phelps, the heart and soul of UNC last season.

Maryland and Virginia prove that the ACC is the strongest of them all. The Terps and Cavs are very similar. Tons of potential — UVa's Junior Burrough and Yuri Barnes, UM's Keith Booth, Duane Simpkins and Exree Hipp.

Minutewomen beat AC on ice

By Jason Wall
Collegian Correspondent

On the strength of two third period goals, the University of Massachusetts women's hockey team defeated Amherst College, 5–4, at Orr Rink yesterday afternoon.

Amherst	4
Massachusetts	5

At 7:02 into the third period, the Minutewomen would get the game winner on Nadia Scocimara's second goal of the game. Hillary Knowlton assisted on the goal.

UMass improves to 3–0 on the season with the win.

At 4:33 of the first period, Amherst forward Morgan McKenney put the home team on the board first, beating the Massachusetts defense and giving the Lord Jeffs an early 1–0 lead.

Just four minutes later, UMass forward Ursula Slate would knot the game at 1–1. She made a quick head fake, pulling Amherst goalie Fran Ganz out of position, which gave Slate an easy goal.

For most of the second half of the first period, UMass dominated play. They took a 2–1 lead six minutes remaining as Tracy Guillmette converted a pass from Jillian Langord and Melissa Fryolo.

The Lord Jeffs evened the score at 2–2 with less than five minutes remaining in the first period. Heather Heaton beat UMass goalie Cheri Ruane. Ruane made the Initial stop but Heaton scored after a series of relentless shots.

The Lord Jeffs carried the momentum into the break after scoring again with :50 left. McKenney added her second goal of the afternoon, beating Ruane on her glove side. Heaton picked up her second point of the night, as she and Alison Chase both assisted on the goal.

Scocimara's first goal of the game on an assist from Slate at 6:45 in the second period tied things up at 3–3.

The game was looking up for UMass when Amherst's Heaton was called consecutively for hooking at 12:10 and elbowing at 16:17, which gave the Minutewomen their only power plays of the game. UMass had opportunities, but could not convert with the extra-skater.

Langord put the Minutewomen ahead to stay, scoring on a centering pass from Heather Ahearn 3:18 into the third period and giving UMass the lead, 4–3.

Amherst got its first power play at 4:59, when Sandy Wright picked up a roughing penalty. McKenney had an excellent scoring opportunity, but could not convert as Ruane made a crucial save.

Knowlton passed the puck up to Scocimara in the neutral zone sending her over the blue line. She caught Heaton off- balance and broke in all alone on Fran Ganz and scored with a wrist shot, putting UMass ahead to stay.

Valerie Klein brought Amherst within one at 11:04, but they could not get the tying goal as the Minutewomen held them off for the victory.

The Minutewomen return to action Saturday afternoon when they take on the Terriers of Boston University at the Mullins Center.

Upsets have already made college basketball season an exciting one

Another season has begun and upsets — the element that makes college basketball great — have already occurred in large and small proportions.

Upsets are a factor that makes the sport what it is, the other is emotion. The two are directly related and produce unrivaled excitement. Massachusetts over Arkansas, Connecticut over Duke are upsets that have shaken the top of the world. George Washington over Syracuse, Utah and Tulane over Indiana are the early season shockers.

This may be a year in which there isn't the dominant superstar, nor the dominant team. The road to Seattle now has many teams believing they can travel the distance.

The critics are saying that this is the year that the Big 10 doesn't have a legitimate Final Four team. Michigan can never be counted out, even though only two members remain from the Fab Five. This year's incoming class is great, but not another Fab Five.

ANTHONY GUIDO
ON COLLEGE BASKETBALL

Freshmen Maurice Taylor and Jerod Ward have to step in for the Wolverines. Taylor must provide quality center play, and Ward scoring at forward. However, this is Jimmy King's team, and Michigan can return to the Final Four after a one-year absence if King can increase his scoring to over 20 points a game.

Michigan State will challenge for the conference title and more. The Spartans have one of the 10 best players in nation in guard Shawn Respert. Point guard Eric Snow combines with Respert to form the conferences best backcourt. Jud Heathcote will be coaching his final season in Lansing, calling this year's squad a legitimate title contender. If they get any play from their big people, MSU can make that run in March.

Illinois, despite the loss of all-time leading scorer Deon Thomas to graduation, is on its way to being a Top 10 program. Bruising Shelly Clark now mans the middle for this athletic team. Standout sophomore Kiwane Garris (15.9 points per game) and a talented group of freshmen will make for Lou Henson's best team since the Final Four team in '89.

Indiana will also be on a down year, and have struggled at the start (1–3). The backcourt is barren, but Bobby Knight will always have his teams ready come tournament time.

Wisconsin returns a talented squad, with two of the top 15 players in the nation in center Rashard Griffith, and forward Michael Finley. The loss of Tracy Webster at point guard will be too difficult to overcome, as will ex-coach Stu Jackson's defection to the NBA.

Jackson left on his accord, but one man who may not have that luxury is UCLA's Jim Harrick. The Bruins must make it to the Final Four, or it likely will mean Harrick's head. Sports Illustrated may consider the Bruins to be number one, but a team that plays no defense can't go that far. Ed O'Bannon returns as the premier forward in the conference; scoring will not the problem, the commitment to defense will. It seems that every year most Pac-10 teams fold in the tournament.

Arizona escaped that last season, making it to the Final Four. A return trip isn't likely, unless Joe Blair can make big strides at center as the backcourt scoring will be down. Arizona excels when the offense is

Chancellor disputes report card

Scott says certain factors are ignored in the grading system

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

Chancellor David K. Scott of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, questioned the measures by which the University was judged in President Michael Hooker's low report card.

Michael K. Hooker, President of the UMass system, issued the UMass report card on Nov. 22. The report card gave a grade for all UMass campus', including Lowell, Dartmouth, Boston, Worcester and Amherst.

According to Hooker, the intent of the report card is to provide data and comparisons so the legislature and public of Massachusetts can assess UMass' performance and progress.

Scott said the report card made it's judgement based on criteria such as the SAT scores of incoming students, the University's ability to obtain research dollars, the University graduation rate, and the success of the alumni.

"I'm very proud of this institution, its students, its faculty, and its staff," Scott said. "We have done wonders here in very difficult times. We are working well together to move this institution forward into the 21st century."

According to the report, the UMass system earned failing grades in private fundraising, sponsored faculty research, and affordability. The report gave UMass average grades in student performance and good grades in public service.

"Overall, I give us a C plus," said Hooker.

The report found graduation rates, student test scores, and retention to be about average when compared to other universities nationally. Hooker also said student SAT scores fell below those of like schools. The entering students last Fall in Amherst had an average SAT score of 990, while similar schools had an average score of 1048.

"This University has lower SAT scores than our peers," said Scott. "However, we graduate students at the same level or even higher than our peers."

Scott said the graduation rate of 66 percent after six years is quite good in comparison to its peers. A recent study of 52 schools ranked this campus 12th in its five year graduation rate of 64 percent.

This University admitted 86 percent of it's applicants, while comparable schools accepted 72 percent. At peer institutions, 38 percent of incoming students were in the top ten percent of their high school class, while here only 12 percent were.

According to the report card, UMass is not as affordable as a public university should be. The report rated UMass to be "about average." The report also said students are paying more money for their education.

"The State's share of the cost of education is lower for UMass than for comparable institutions in other states," said the report, "And the students' share is higher."

Scott said criteria such as economic development attributed to the University in Western Massachusetts, the scholarship of it's faculty, and how the University responds to social issues such as multiculturalism, were not given enough attention in the report card.

Scott said the quality of the faculty at UMass is measured in more ways than the amount of research funding they receive.

Scott said the University does well in obtaining research funds with the facilities and faculty on hand. "Given the underfunding of our infrastructure and the lack of funding to hire new faculty, I maintain we do a very credible job," said Scott.

"One of the members of our English faculty just won the National Book Award for Poetry," said Scott. "Another was a finalist for the National Book Award for nonfiction. These measures of quality don't show up in lists of research grants."

Students march in a campus vigil to raise awareness of epidemic

JESSICA TAVERNA / COLLEGIAN

Students participate in a candlelight vigil to commemorate World AIDS Day last night.

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

The air was cold, but the candles stayed lit and managed to shed light on the darkness — in more ways than one.

Thirty people marched around the University of Massachusett's campus pond with candles last night, in a tribute to World AIDS Day.

The walk started at the Student Union Building steps and ended in the Cape Cod Lounge, after the group took one loop around the pond.

> "We're doing this to raise awareness, make it an annual tradition and motivate people to get involved."
> – Sally Damon

This is the second year in a row the walk was held for the internationally-recognized World AIDS Day, according to Sally Damon, a health educator at the University Health Services.

"We're doing this to raise awareness, make it an annual tradition and motivate people to get involved," Damon said.

There was an open forum in the Cape Cod Lounge following the walk, where people had the opportunity to express their feelings concerning World AIDS Day.

"This is a very sad day. We have to remain vigilant to finding a cure and not treating people like victims who are afflicted," said Keith Webb, a school of education graduate student. "This is an innocent killer — it knows no boundaries."

A tree, which is on display on the campus concourse today, was decorated after the walk with different colored ribbons. People were encouraged to pin one of the three different colored ribbons representing anger, sadness and commitment.

The anger ribbons were for expressions of anger towards government inaction, heterosexism and racism, for example, according to Craig Stevens, a graduate student in community health education who ran last night's event.

The sadness ribbons were for people who chose to express who or what they have lost to the epidemic, whether it be freedom, a sibling, a lover or anything else of significant loss, Stevens said.

The commitment ribbon was a way for people to declare the actions they will take towards prevention in the next year, both personal and public, Stevens said.

"It scares me. It's so easy to get it, and nobody's immune," said Wendy Schoeler, a freshman. "It has changed so many things."

The widespread epidemic allegedly infects one out of every 500 college students.

"AIDS is so prevalent and it's so important that people realize that they need to do something about it," said Gail Cirlin, a sophomore wildlife biology major.

The trouble with college campuses is that it is hard to know who's effected, because people look well, Damon said. This is why there is an overwhelming need for education in preventing transmission of sexually transmitted diseases.

"There's this feeling of invulnerability," Damon said.

Leslie Firestone, a graduate student in public health, said that she thought the event was a way in which people who died from AIDS could be remembered.

"It makes people think and reflect about the seriousness of the repercussions in their own lives," Wolth said. "Hopefully it will inspire them to do something – something positive."

Different views are held on Prop. 187

By Juan Jose Chacon Quiros de Quetzalcoatl
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This is the last in four-part series on Proposition 187.

Proposition 187 is no longer a Californian's issue; it has moved into the national sphere and has become a topic of conversation around the world. However, it seems like most students at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst are not even aware of the existence of Proposition 187.

PROP 187 — News Analysis

"I haven't kept up with that, I don't know anything about it," said Dan Sullivan, a sophomore. Others seem to remember after mentioning key words like California, immigration and health services. "What's that?" said Suvann-Komar Loeung an American citizen of Cambodian origin. Later he added "I heard about it but I don't clearly understand it."

Michael Perkins, a senior economies major, accepts the fact that he doesn't know much about the proposition but he can understand that in the case of California it might be practical. "Morally it seems wrong but economically it looks like they might need to do it."

According to a Business Week / Harris poll, 60 percent of the United States population believe that immigration is "bad." An editorial in Business Week shows that there is no reason to believe this: "From the standpoint of the overall economy, the answer is a resounding no. Immigration has proved to be a powerful, pervasive economic stimulant . . . It would be even more unwise to leave it to know-nothing bigots to give voice to what two-thirds of the people are feeling."

Raul Tovares from the University of Texas at Austin believes that the current movement against immigrants has no basis. "It is time for clear thinking, rational discourse and positive action that will set the country on a course leading it away from a set of laws that encourage shameful persecutory acts and, instead, guide it toward a more just and equitable social policy regarding one of our nation's greatest resources, immigrants, both the documented and the undocumented."

But Tovares' view is far from becoming the conventional view in American society. It seems like the anti-immigration phenomenon is a problem for all of the industrialized countries.

The enactment of laws such as Proposition 187, have been going on in Europe for the last decade. Germany's open immigration policy could not hold the weight of reunification. As a result, the number of immigrants is going to be curved down starting this year. In France, Jean-Marie Le Pen has been winning strength with his tough anti- immigration stance. Since then, France, a nation unwilling to adopt a multicultural policy, has decided to keep the foreign population at 4.2 million.

Western nations have been the target of strong criticism from foreign observers for being unwilling to accept their share of responsibility for a large percentage of the immigration taking place. The West is being accused of both establishing the injustices that fuel people in bordering countries, and creating a paradise image of western societies. Immigrants hoping to escape their difficulties soon decide to migrate to countries in Europe or the United States.

According to James O. Goldsborough from the San Diego Tribune, "Poverty is the father of immigration, war is the mother of refugees. The sooner the West, in its own interest, helps defeat that unholy couple, the sooner it will bring immigration under control."

At the Amherst campus, people that have some knowledge of Proposition 187 seem to agree with that perspective. "I think that Proposition 187 is using immigrants as scapegoats for the economy. Is not a solution, there's got be a better one," said Tim Mallon, a senior in the resource economics department.

"I'm not happy that it passed and I have family in California. I think people are blaming their problems on immigrants and they are forgetting

Sexual acts spotlight AIDS, bring variety of reactions

By Darienne J. Hosley
Collegian Staff

In an effort to drive home the message of World AIDS Day yesterday, five students demonstrated safer sex acts for 20 minutes on the Campus Center Concourse yesterday afternoon.

The role-play included homosexual and heterosexual acts including oral sex, anal sex, mutual masturbation and digital penetration. A crowd of more than 70 passersby stopped to watch, responding with applause, laughter and some disgust.

"AIDS is no longer a homosexual issue," said sophomore Ali Davis at the start of the display. "AIDS killed my uncle's lover, AIDS may kill you. I don't want to die of AIDS.

"Take what you are about to see for the humor that is in it, but this is also a serious issue," he said.

Davis, who is the political chair for the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance, said neither the LBGA, the Program for Gay Lesbian Bisexual Concerns nor any other group sponsored the demonstration. Before the presentation, the group warned the crowd that their actions would be graphic.

Davis and junior Jeff Beck simulated oral and anal sex using dildos while Kelly Hayes described proper use of a condom to prevent contracting sexually transmitted diseases.

With Chris Leavitt and Sally Peabody, the group demonstrated proper use of condoms, latex gloves and plastic wrap for safer sex.

All five remained clothed.

Each act was applauded by members of the crowd, who also laughed at lighter touches like an unusually large dildo. Some, however, were not amused or impressed.

"This is totally unnecessary," said one spectator.

The demonstration happened to coincide with the Student Union Craft Center's Craft Fair and a number of vendors were visibly angry.

"I'm 38 years old, and I've been a liberal for a good 20 years but I found that to be revolting and disgusting," said Michael Entriker, who was selling jewelry directly in front of the demonstration.

"I don't disagree with the point they were making," added Ed Cope, a Pioneer Valley resident who was selling wood crafts. "But I have rights and I paid to be here. I lost business for the 20 minutes that they were here."

John Whitney of Gothic Traditions Studio said the students caused congestion of traffic and that he was concerned about the safety of his merchandise.

Entriker and Cope said that the Craft Center director had promised that no such event would disturb

Conference on women's issues to redefine the feminine agenda

By Un Yong Ko
Special to the Collegian

Editor's Note: This is the final article of the three part series examining the issues which will be presented at the upcoming women's conference on Saturday.

The largest student-organized conference held this year at the University of Massachusetts will take place tomorrow in the Campus Center Auditorium at 10:00 a.m.

The 1994 Women's Conference, entitled, "Voices of the Majority: Women Against Oppression" is being organized by 15 graduate and undergraduate women from the Five College Area and is being sponsored by over 30 student organizations, departments and campus agencies, says Ju Hui Han, one of the organizers of the conference.

The aim of the conference organizers is to redefine the "Feminist Agenda" such that it reflects the concerns of the majority of the world's women. For example, large parts of Africa have been plagued by wars which have had devastating effect on the populations such as Somalia.

During the cold-war era, both the former Soviet Union and the Unites States supplied arms and vied for the support of Siad Barre the political leader of Somalia. Barre kept switching allegiances in an attempt to extract maximum concessions for himself and retain his power. The collapse of the Soviet Union has resulted in Civil War and chaos in Somalia. For the average person in Somalia this has meant poverty and famine-like conditions.

Conference panelists Dr. Tsehai Berhane-Selassie for Ethiopia, speaking on the panel Women From Developing Nations will address the effect of wars on women in Africa. Dr. Berhane-Selassie, who is currently a professor at the Institute for Advanced Studies at Princeton University will delineate the ways in which women in Africa have organized at the grass-roots level to overcome the effects of war, and provide for their children and families.

Dr. Barbara Nimri-Aziz will discuss the condition of families and children in Iraq, as a result of the United Nations sanctions. Dr. Nimri-Aziz is a free lance journalist who has recently visited the Middle-East.

On the domestic front Dalila Balfour will discuss the role of the sex industry in spreading AIDS and HIV in poor communities. She will describe the community-based organizing, and participatory models used by health-care workers to increase awareness among women on AIDS prevention. According to Catherine Van Damm, "AIDS is a severe problem among women, that is not being taken seriously by the government. There should be viable economic alternatives for poor women, so they are not dependent on the sex-industry to survive."

Political quotes of note

During a debate on abortion funding in the recent election, Rep. Richard Armey (R-Tex.) inquired, "Are we going to be so fem-centric that we're going to condone the self- indulgent conduct of the body of a woman who...[was] damned careless with it in the first place?" If you think that's bad, Rep. Jay Dickey (R-Ark.) explained his position against permitting abortion in cases of incest by saying, "I think incest can be handled as a family matter within the family."

The child/career balancing act

This past summer, Jennifer Ireland, a 19-year-old student, lost custody of her 3-year-old daughter because she sent the girl to a day care center approximately 35 hours a week while she attended classes at the University of Michigan. Shortly following that, Sharon Prost, a Capitol Hill lawyer, lost custody of her two sons to her former husband because a judge found that she had pursued her career at the expense of her children.

Nancy Polikoff, a professor at the American University Law School in Washington D.C., is one of many people who believe that there exists a bias against working women and those who attend school when it comes to custody battles.

"Women who don't fulfill a stereotype of a person who does 100 percent of all child-rearing look like they're incompetent and uninterested and are seen in an unfavorable light," said Polikoff. "Mothers are judged more harshly than fathers because fathers aren't expected to do much."

Classroom smarts

Kristen Ducharme, a 14-year-old girl from Pelham, N.H., used classroom lessons to foil a robbery at her home. Once Ducharme realized the intentions of the strange man outside the door, she hurried to parents' bedroom and telephoned the police. Officers arrested 21-year-old Peter O'Neill just after he had loaded the Ducharme's VCR, stereo and microwave, among other things, into the back of his car. Ducharme recalled that "Every year in grammar school a policeman would come and talk to us about how to call in an emergency. I guess it just kind of stuck with me."

Former sex slaves recall horror

Sex slavery horrors are being recounted as former World War II sex slaves recall their ordeal. The 60 and 70-year-old Japanese women, many of whom were teenagers at the time, told their stories in a report issued last week by the International Commission of Jurists, a U.N. human-rights group based in Geneva. The women recalled being confined to tiny cubicles, fed scraps of food, repeatedly raped and beaten, and then left untreated for rampant venereal disease. The wartime ordeal was ignored for nearly 50 years, in part because the women were ashamed to speak out. Now, many of the victims live on the margins of society, ill and with no families to support them.

Pregnancy seen as a solution

For many unwed teens, pregnancy gives them a reason for living. More than one million teenagers will get pregnant this year; a third of them will be age 17 or younger. Teenagers will give birth to a half-million babies — 70 percent born out of wedlock. Next year, Congress will consider proposals to cut off aid to young mothers, or make them work for their welfare checks.

She said...

"One is not born a woman, one becomes one."

UVC gives students a learning opportunity

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

Samantha Oates, a senior communications major and Union Video Center (UVC) reporter headed to the new Learning Resources Center in the W.E.B. Du Bois Library with UVC News Producer and cameraman Willie Sanchez, to find out what the center is all about.

UVC, which is located in the basement of the University of Massachusetts Student Union is where behind the scenes work goes on before shows like UMass Update and Room 507 air on channel 19 of Housing Services Cable Network.

UVC is bustling with activity. There is discussion of who will cover what story, and who has editing time and needs equipment. Kristine Williams, a freshman communications major asks for opinions on her new idea for a story about weekend activities at UMass.

"UVC is great because [the reporters] get to choose whatever we want to do for a story," Williams said.

"We are student run and produced, so we are very open to ideas," said UVC News Producer and senior HRTA major Peter Wolly.

"I work in the Colleges of Arts and Sciences Information and Advising Center (CASIAC) and students always ask where they can get help and tutoring, so I decided to do a piece on the center so that students will know where to go for help," said Oates.

Oates enters the newly furnished office of the director of the Learning Resources Center, followed by Sanchez and his camera, to begin the interview. The team introduces themselves and Oates chats with the director as Sanchez sets up the equipment and helps the director with his microphone.

Tape is then ready to roll, and Oates proceeds with the interview, finding out the purpose and goal of the center.

After her questions, Sanchez moves behind the director and films reaction shots of Oates nodding her head.

"If you watch something like Barbara Walters, they have two cameras, one on the reporter and the other on the person being interviewed," Sanchez explained. "Since we only have one camera, we get shots of both people and put them together, this way you see both sides of the conversation," he said.

Learning to operate the equipment like the camera Sanchez uses is an important part of becoming a UVC member. In order to become a member, a student must go through a series of workshops taught by Jennifer Andrews, a producer from New York City who works with Katmandu Productions.

UVC President Brian Johnson explained that when the workshops are completed, students are able to take out equipment and cover stories that appeal to them.

"Students come to UVC and think that they won't be able to do a show, but the workshops are geared for all levels," Johnson said. "The show or story may not be perfect the first time, but it is a learning experience."

Oates, who has gone through all the necessary workshops, has been reporting for UVC since the beginning of the semester. She said she is pleased with her recent interview.

"It went really well," Oates said. "He was cooperative and spoke a lot. Some people are camera shy and get very nervous, but he was very helpful."

She then interviews three students who tutor at the center, all with eager smiles, due to the fact they may be on television.

Sanchez pans the center and gets shots of the students in action and the regular activity in progress.

The team then shoots the stand-up, which according to Oates is the reporter's general wrap-up of the story. They also film a bridge, the reporter's transition, in this case between speaking to the director and the students.

When the taping is complete, the two return to UVC headquarters to screen the tape and edit it for UMass Update, which is produced weekly and airs at 2 p.m. and 7 p.m. each day on channel 19.

Reporters roam campus interviewing students about issues ranging from the basketball controversy to the recent senatorial race between Sen. Edward Kennedy and Mitt Romney.

"We try to tape a lot of lectures," Will Sweeney, UVC productions coordinator and freshman communications major said.

UVC needs to get permission from the speaker and a copyright before they get a crew together and go out to shoot, Sweeney said. "We taped Farakkan when he spoke, which was exciting because it was such a hot topic," he said.

Working for UVC is valuable experience for future jobs in broadcast journalism and production, according to Wolly.

"UVC is where you can be on TV and learn about the background of productions. We have the resources and experience to teach students," Amy McDougal, senior communications major and publicity director of UVC, said. She said her goal for this semester is to reach more of the campus community.

"We are trying to get more people involved, because the more students we have working and watching, the better the programming," McDougal said.

"I want to be a director," said Williams, "and UVC gives me opportunities and experience."

The experience from UVC opens many doors of opportunity. Working at UVC helped Wolly land a job with Larry King Live on CNN, and last year's news producer from UVC is also employed by CNN.

their business.

Peer Health Educators staffing a safer sex information table at the other end of the Concourse said they were not involved in the demonstration, but that the unusual approach to education was effective.

"Different things get through to different people," said junior Christine Palomba. "Sometimes humor helps get the message across."

"Sometimes the shock factor works," added Sally Damon, a health educator for University Health Services.

Wanda waited night after night, curiously wondering where that little monkey George was. Little did she know that after he had sedated the man in the yellow hat and had commandeered the Prince of Malawi's limo, the FBI was mobilized. This resulted in a 46 hour high speed chase. Tragically, the wheels of the limo spun out on a bunch of bananas that had dropped out of the bed of a produce truck, and George's limo careened into the truck of a traveling Hungarian circus. Thrown from the wreck, George, as fate would have it, landed in the monkey cage. The cage was lined with

Do you think student athletes should get paid?

Compiled By Tim White • Photos By Emily Reily

"No, definitely not, that's only for professional sports. It's like the Olympics, you shouldn't get paid in the Olympics. They came to the school to play sports."
–MIKE LUCIER
senior, plant and soil science
Duxbury

"No, they should do homework and not be getting paid for a sport. I think that's their choice, if they really want to play a sport, then they have to decide what is more important to them [sports or a part-time job]."
–JANICE KINSEY
post-grad, biology
Hudson

"I'd say no because they do already get money, and they should be here for education — wait until they get to the pros. They get stipends usually more than I make working my job."
–DAMIEN BASKETTE
senior, communications
New York City

"I think they're already getting paid; they're getting free room and board, tuition, so they are getting paid. I'm sure they already get some money for expenses."
–MIKE DEROSA
post-grad, geography and education
Amherst

"I don't see why they shouldn't get paid. Even though they get scholarships they don't get the opportunity to get a job. If they work for it, academics and sports, why not?"
–JENNY BALBUENA
junior, fine arts
Lawrence

"No because it's an extra-curricular activity at school. It's their choice to play I guess. We work to go to school, so if they get a scholarship, they don't need to pay for school."
–JENNIFER WISCHHOF
senior, sociology
Holyoke

"No because they're athletes at school. It's part of school activities and they shouldn't paid for their involvement — it's not a job to play a sport. I think that's one of the benefits to playing a sport is the scholarships."

AIDS is not a temporary crisis

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

"AIDS has become more than an epidemic," said Derek Link, of the Gay Men's Health Crisis — New York. "It's endemic in society at large."

Link spoke last night as part of a panel discussion on the state of the AIDS/HIV epidemic, entitled "Are We Surviving?" The discussion was sponsored by the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns and University Health Services (UHS).

According to Link, when AIDS first came onto the scene, the feeling was that it was a temporary crisis, something that could be overcome in a few years. Ad campaigns and protests could get people to change their behavior long enough to make it through the most difficult period. When that period was over, however, people could go back to their old behaviors and life would return to normal.

As it turns out, however, the battle against AIDS may well be the battle that makes or breaks society.

An "insidious disease"

"You couldn't have a more insidious disease," said Link. "AIDS takes advantage of all our insecurities about sex."

Many AIDS service organizations are having to rethink their strategies because the old ones were the equivalent of band-aids. Telling a man he has to wear a condom every time he has sex for the next five years is one thing, but telling him that he can not have unprotected sex for the rest of his life is quite another.

Tim Hack, prevention coordinator for AIDS Action — Boston, was another speaker on the panel. According to Hack, over the past couple of years AIDS educators have come to realize that their efforts are not working, especially among those who are most at risk.

Young people at risk

Just as in Africa, where AIDS was first identified, the disease in America has moved from something prevalent in all age groups to something that is affecting the lives of more and more young people, said Link.

In a study undertaken by the Fenway Community Health Center, out of 508 gay and bisexual men in the their late teens and early 20s, 26.4 percent reported engaging in unprotected anal intercourse and 2.4 percent were infected with HIV.

This is extremely disturbing news, reported Hack, because the men surveyed were old enough to have lived through years of AIDS education. Young people are one of the most at-risk groups, and yet apparently they are not taking AIDS seriously enough to take steps to protect themselves.

Women ignored in the fight

Morning talk show hosts hold 52 hour food drive

By M. Isabel Tereso
Collegian Correspondent

From Monday, Nov. 21 at 6:00 a.m. to Nov. 23 at 10:00 a.m., the morning DJ team of Jonathan Reynolds and Jon O'Brien from Rock 102 FM held the first ever "Mayflower Marathon" in the parking lot of Springfield's Basketball Hall of Fame.

"Mayflower Marathon" was sponsored by the Basketball Hall of Fame and Rock 102. Reynolds and O'Brien were the only two men on location at the Basketball Hall of Fame parking lot for the entire 52 hours.

Their goal was to fill a Mayflower tractor trailer truck of non-perishable food items to donate to the Emergency Food Pantry Program of the Open Pantry of Springfield. The non- perishable food items collected are donated to families in need due to an emergency or crisis.

An additional truck was needed to help transport the food donations on Wednesday morning because the tractor trailer truck was filled. The food trucks were unloaded with the help of inmates on the pre-release program from the Hampden County House of Corrections in Ludlow along with volunteers from the soup kitchen.

Donors came from as far north as Vermont and as far south as Hartford. Reynolds also said that UMass students donated food items, as well as a copy of the Collegian for their reading pleasure.

"We would like to do this again next year, and would like to encourage students from UMass to participate. Maybe we can figure out some sort of networking with them," Reynolds said.

Kevin Noonan, director of the Open Pantry said that in addition to the donation of food, $2,500 was also donated, $1,000 of which came from the Bank of Boston, and the remainder from listeners of Rock 102 and other corporate sponsors. Noonan was delighted with the turnout.

"I think it's fantastic and a tremendous compliment to Rock 102 that its listeners are willing to support those who are less fortunate in our community," said Noonan. "It was a pleasure to work with them, and we hope to work with them again in the future."

Noonan also said that the truck loads of food would last until February, and possibly into March, depending on the demand. However, donations are always appreciated, and in the case of excess, are shared with their other programs such as Open Door Social Services, Loaves and Fishes Soup Kitchen, and Transitional Living Programs.

Noonan said that the Open Pantry does not have money set aside for advertising. The ongoing operation of the pantry relies on the continuous support of the community and corporate sponsors.

The idea for this event originated with the Basketball Hall of Fame staff,

Distinguished professor tells tale of ages

By Henry Brier
Collegian Staff

"A mystery lies right here beneath your feet this afternoon," said Professor Peter Robinson of the department of geology and geography.

Robinson spoke Wednesday as part of the University's Distinguished Faculty Lecture Series.

Chancellor David K. Scott introduced Robinson as "one of our truly distinguished faculty members" and he thanked the Alumni Association for their support in making possible the 21st year of the Distinguished Faculty Lectures. There were almost no open seats, and people crowded to stand in the back of the room of Memorial Hall to listen to Robinson.

"My task this afternoon is to treat you to a mystery," he said. "A mystery based on truth that lies right here beneath your feet in Amherst."

Robinson was awarded the medal for Distinguished Service by Scott after his lecture.

Robinson, who has been studying geology and geography for 35 years, received his bachelor of arts degree from Dartmouth College in New Hampshire, his master of science degree from the University of Otaga in New Zealand, and he holds a doctorate from Harvard University.

Scott spoke of Robinson having "published groundbreaking work in crystal chemistry" and also having studied structural and regional geology, mineralogy, international geological correlation and plate tectonics of Europe.

Robinson served as the President of the American Mineralogical Society of America from 1989 to 1990. His lecture was entitled "2.8 Billion Years of Earth History in the Amherst Region: A Continuing Detective Story."

■ proposition 187

that they are immigrants too," said Professor Lynmarie Thompson of the chemistry department.

It seems like the unrest in California could spread to other states with an immigration problem as they try to pass similar legislation. Arizona, Texas and Miami are willing to enact laws to restrict immigration. The Republican success in the November elections will give these measures a new vitality.

The House Republican Policy Committee released a statement on illegal immigration. It calls for a "comprehensive program — legislative, judicial and diplomatic — for our country to regain control of its borders." In the meantime immigrants in towns near the border will continue to wave the Mexican flag everytime they feel they are in danger.

Robinson's lecture was split into five sections he called "clues," and it stretched back hundreds of millions of years.

Robinson discussed the several different time periods of the history of the earth, beginning with the Triassic period which occurred between 208 to 245 million years ago.

Robinson discussed the Silurian Period, which was 408 to 440 million years ago. Also cited by Professor Robinson was the Devonian Period, which occurred 360 to 408 million years ago. Both periods were during the Paleozoic Era, he said.

The last section dated back 2500 to 4000 million years ago during the Archean Era. Robinson cited similar types of rocks currently found in western Argentina and western Massachusetts, strongly suggesting that the coast of South America and what is now the Atlantic seaboard of the United States were once joined. This united mass of land has been called Gondwana, said Robinson, and this mass of land is recognized by geologists to have been in place during the Archean Era.

"History is not over, and you can be sure that the inquisitive minds trained in this University will continue to be sharpened by more sophisticated techniques which are going to build and get more clues to tell the story of Amherst's past," Robinson said.

"Professor Robinson gave a multi-dimensional lecture," Scott said.

Bah Humbug! X–Mas trauma

"I hate this time of year," was all I could mumble as I walked out of the mall empty-handed on that cold December day, tears almost coming to my eyes. I never imagined I'd have to stretch $50 so far. With a gift list as long as my arm, I hadn't been able to find a decent present at a reasonable price in any of the stores. It seemed I was going to experience my first "All for a Dollar" Christmas. I could just see the looks on the faces of all my friends and family as they unwrapped their plastic watches and bags of assorted combs. Humiliation is the only way to describe what I would feel. I could always justify my gift choices with the fact that money is hard to come by for a college student, but that wouldn't help to fill rapidly–expanding void in my heart.

Mark McGrath

"And what about Christmas cards?" I thought. "I can only afford a few, so who should I send them to? Whatever I do, someone will be left out."

Out of sheer frustration, I attempted to kick the snowbank at my side. As I started to swing my leg, I caught a patch of ice, and went flying through the air. My whole body was horizontal for a time, and I landed with equally crushing blows to my back and head. I just laid there until an old guy in a Santa suit came over to help me up.

He gave me his hand and pulled me to my feet, at that point I started to trod away.

"What's the matter with you?" he asked.

"This whole Christmas thing has got me down," I responded. "My money can only stretch so far. I'll never be able to buy a present for everyone who deserves one."

"Hold on there lad," he said. "You seem to be lost. Do you really know the true meaning of Christmas? It's not about gifts. Do you really think your friends and family are going to care if they don't receive beautiful presents?"

"Actually they'll care a lot," I responded. "They probably won't talk to me for the next century."

"I'm afraid to say it, but you're right. That whole 'True meaning of Christmas' thing is just a crock of crap," he said. "I remember the time I tried to pull that on my wife. She threw me out of the house for a week."

He continued, "What is the meaning of Christmas? I'll tell you what the real meaning is. It's greed. The people today have twisted a solemn religious holiday into a civil festival. My wife used to go home after each party to tally the net loss or gain on each gift exchange. Her goal was to make at least 20 percent profit on the deal. That's what Christmas meant to her. Now that I'm all alone I don't celebrate that holiday anymore."

Being the detective that I am, I questioned him about his suit. He told me that the suit was going to be thrown out, and he saved it. It proved to be very warm anyway. In December, he said all he had to do was go outside with a bell and pot, and he could come away with a month's rent in three hours. In his opinion Christmas made people wacky, and wacky people deserved to lose their money.

The more I thought about it, the more I saw the bad qualities that entered into people during the Christmas season. I wondered if this holiday was a good thing. Then the idea hit me.

"Sir," I asked, "can I borrow your suit, bell, and pot? I would like to experience the true meaning of Christmas."

He lent me the suit, and I made over one hundred dollars that afternoon. I made a return trip to the mall and bought myself some presents. Now that's what Christmas is really all about, and what a nice holiday it is.

Power has inflated Republicans

"The sky is falling, the sky is falling." — Chicken Little.

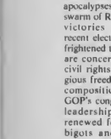
The end of the world is upon us. Or maybe it is just on hiatus, one is never sure when dealing with apocalypses. But the swarm of Republican victories in the recent elections have frightened those who are concerned with civil rights and religious freedoms. The composition of the GOP's congressional leadership has renewed fears that bigots and homophubes will once again be designing legislation to restrict free expression.



A. J. Stewart

Power has quickly made some of these politicians giddy. Sen. Jesse Helms effectively threatened the President's life by saying he should bring a bodyguard if he plans to visit North Carolina, a statement that if made by the rest of us would probably lead to a visit in the federal penitentiary. We can add this latest incident to the illustrious career of Helms, who has in the past come out against the Middle East peace treaty, supported the banning of books in school libraries (some suggest it was because he could not read them), and is openly frightened of homosexuals. If Helms accurately represents the people of North Carolina, then the state will be scratched from my list of vacation destinations.

We can shift our attention from the incoming chairman of the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee to the future Speaker of the House, Newt Gingrich. To the resounding applause of misguided conservatives everywhere, Newt has proposed the idea of a constitutional amendment overturning the Supreme Court's decision banning prayer in public schools. The religious right is preaching again, wildly thumping Bibles and including "Christian" in speeches about topics as diverse as welfare reform, health care, and believe it or not, the economy. This strange group of zealots actually believes that God will balance the budget for them. "Four trillion dollars in debt, that's nothing. Parting the Red Sea, now that was a big deal."

The holier than thou attitude being marketed by these politicians is especially grating because they are expounding on topics that they do not comprehend. It is as if Newt and Jesse are graduates of Backwoods Bible school, confusing the sermon on the mount with the theme music to Davy Crockett. They claim that this country's young are morally bankrupt, and then vote to cut aid to families with dependent children. They say that we need more religion, and are staunch supporters of the death penalty. There is no rational foundation for their arguments, no conviction in their voices. These so–called religious politicians proclaim their love of God, only to spew their hate for single mothers or homosexuals soon afterwards. The message seems fairly clear that this wing of the party is not especially tolerant of people different from themselves. Read your Bible, even if you are a Buddhist.

I could rationally outline all the problems I have with the intermingling of religion and the government. But I would rather just be angry and vitriolic. Nothing about the current political climate bothers me more than the emergence of pseudo religion into discussions of public policy. Above any spiritual belief I may personally hold, I have a desire to keep an appropriate separation between church and state. You may recall certain men named Jefferson and Madison believing this also.

America is the most diverse country on the globe, and the scheming to bring a variety of cultures, faiths and beliefs into one Judeo–Christian heritage is an absolute outrage. It alienates many of us who do not belong in this tradition, and frankly don't want any part of it. God, or whoever the object of your spiritual affections is, should be kept in our hearts and minds, not on C–SPAN and certainly not in our classrooms.

Astrology department builds for future

To the editor:

I was surprised and a little alarmed to read in Wednesday's second page article that astrology department is building a telescope in Mexico. The otherwise very interesting and factual article also states that astrology professor William Irvine is also the director of the Five College Radio Astronomy Observatory at the Quabbin reservoir. I thought it rather strange that the astrology department would have the resources or the desire to build a 46 million dollar telescope in Mexico. Astrology, after all, is the study of the heavens to determine the future for people that have been born in certain times of the years. If this telescope is being built by the astrology department, I would certainly expect to see Jeanne Dixon's horoscope predictions get a little more concise. And also, I would be alarmed to know that a professor of astrology was directing an astronomical observatory, for the purposes of studying the properties of the physical universe to learn more about the nature of our existence. Please look into these concerns for me, or at least consider hiring a new proofreader.

Criticism shows cultural bias

To the editor:

My feelings for Chancellor David K. Scott aside, Juan Jose Chacon Quiros de Quetzalcoatl's remark about the Chancellor's British accent should have been edited from his Nov. 30 editorial. It sounded like Scott is disliked for being English in addition to all the other reasons cited. I hope that while we each strive to confront our hatred and dispel our myths about people from cultures different from our own we also work to eliminate comments that promote racist images in the media.

Columns that never happened

With the semester coming to a close and Thanksgiving having just passed, I find myself with several leftover column ideas that I will sadly be unable to touch upon in great detail this semester. So, take the following potpourri of snippets from my brain for what it's worth: nonsense.

Pot Smokers: I was at a party on a recent Saturday night, enjoying myself and the company of the gathered friends and strangers. That feeling of content excitement was ruined as suddenly as six neo–hippies entered the apartment we were at.

David Copeland

The excited babble that had filled the room only moments earlier was quickly replaced by a boring monologue about "six foot bongs" and "kind bud."

Personally, I have nothing against marijuana or it's users. In fact I think it's a great drug that should be experimented with frequently. But that doesn't mean that we have to turn ourselves into people with one–dimensional personalities who talked about how high they get, how much paraphernalia they own and nothing else.

Pot smoking is rife of passage for college students, but it's not the only one. Just because you like to get high on a daily basis doesn't mean that you're the only "cool" kid doing it. Give it up and find something better to talk about than the finite points of gravity bong construction.

Those weird guys walking around campus: Over the past few days our cozy little campus has been infiltrated by members of some abnormal religious sect. They walk around, politely introducing themselves to anyone who crosses their path. They make small talk ("Where you from?" and "What are you studying?"), and then begin to tell you of some strange man who has written several books about his teachings.

And lo and behold, they just happen to have a sack full of these fine books that they would like to "give" to you. "Great," gullible me says, "I can always use a new book to prop up my broken dining room table."

But then, this short haired man takes on a divine and solemn voice. "We do request a 10 dollar donation."

See ya!

Who are these people, and why have they chosen our campus to spread the teachings of whats–his–name for the affordable price of 10 bucks? Even more puzzling, who is it that keeps "donating" money to these men so that they think UMass is a profitable location to market their wares?

Well, at least I'll know where to go if I get behind in my Christmas shopping.

Elevators: I'm on a big academic kick this semester (this means I'm only failing one class), so I have been spending a lot of time at the tower library.

I like to study on the higher floors, so that I can get a unique view of the campus when I get up to take a break. This means that I take the elevator most times that I am in the library.

Elevators themselves don't bug me. In fact I kind of like being thrown up and down a building at 60 feet per second. It's the people who ride the elevator that get to me.

Why is it that able bodied people insist on taking the elevator up or down one or two flights of stairs? It seems to me that you people have a fear of using the elevator, and then fighting your way on and off the tiny little box than it would take to walk down a measly flight of stairs.

Let's establish a rule of thumb: more than four flights, the elevator is fair game. But if you're only going up or down a few flights, take the stairs. There are convenient maps on each floor that show you where to find these ancient relics of the time before elevators.

Of course I'm not as lazy as these people are. Pass the remote; this weird book I bought on campus the other day is getting pretty boring.

The snobbery behind town rivalry

If there is one thing I hate, it's a snob. People who hold themselves and their friends, their hobbies, their college, their hometown, and their general lifestyle above that of others have a way of nauseating me from the get–go.

Caleb Cochran

I found it very interesting, then, when an observer pointed out to me some characteristics in my behavior which I can't tolerate in others.

I was home over Thanksgiving when my mother asked me what I planned to do over the weekend before heading back to school. My reply was a mumble about playing Sega hockey and watching some football on TV.

"No, I mean do you want to go do something? You know, outside of the house?"

I had some real reservations about leaving the house at all, as my dad and I had a running contest over the weekend to see who could go longer without putting on a pair of shoes. I would most certainly lose this game if I took my mother up on her offer to leave the house. But I had other questions as well.

"What is there to do around here?" I asked. This is when my mother gave me the look that could only be interpreted to say, "I guess you're too good for your hometown now, aren't you? I forgot you're a cool college senior now. What would this backwards town have to offer someone as cultured as you, a resident of the esteemed Pioneer Valley, the epitome of Academia?"

Well, maybe she didn't intend for me to get all that out of her look, but that was the gist of it. After three–and–a–half years of college, I wanted little to do with the area where I had lived for 18 years before coming to Amherst.

Part of this mentality stems from the fact that there actually aren't that many things for college kids to do in the beautiful (but often boring) Berkshires. But another part of my attitude had nothing to do with the lack of things to do at home, but with the fact that I now thought of my hometown as being inferior to my surroundings at school. And this is snobbery at its utmost.

To be sure, the Five College area has much to offer both in the way of culture and of fun. Those of you from Boston and other metropolitan areas may scoff at this statement, but in contrast to the small town I grew up in, the Pioneer Valley is an exciting area. When I return home I genuinely miss the opportunities that I have every day here at the University.

There is a fine line between enjoying and appreciating the place where you live and being pompous about it. There is nothing wrong with taking pride in your town, but there is something wrong with believing that where you live is somehow "better" than another area. More people? Maybe. More things to do? Perhaps. But to classify one area as "better" than another is to place yourself above the people who don't happen to live where you do.

Take pride in your community. It's important. But when you start to classify your town as "better" than another, you're going to get yourself in trouble. And your mother may not be there to point it out to you.

What ever happened to Pac–Man?

While at home over the holiday I got a chance to catch up on some TV watching. Well, MTV mostly. (Gotta keep up with those "Buzz Clips" y'know!) And watching a lot of MTV means that one is undoubtedly going to see a lot of commercials, especially for video games.

MIKE'S MENTAL STEW

With the constant barrage of ads for all of these kung-fu type games, which, incidentally are beginning to become more and more indistinguishable from sneaker commercials, it's hard not to start thinking about all the games we used to play when we were kids. And how they have changed for the better, and worse, since then.

One of my most vivid memories is waking up early one Christmas morning to find Moon Patrol for my Commodore 64 (no snickering please). I played it until my eyes started to hurt, and then some, and it was great. This was the mid– eighties, not too long after Pac–Man had taken the country by storm, and I'll always consider it the hey–day of arcade games.

There was nothing more fun for me than going to the YMCA on a Saturday morning for league basketball and hanging around for an hour afterwards playing Asteroids, Donkey Kong, Tempest or Centipede. This is probably the only reason I kept playing basketball up through Jr. High, after all, I'm only 5 feet, 4 inches tall — it wasn't because I was good. It was all to have an excuse to keep pumping in the quarters.

A dollar could get you four, count 'em, four games back then, unless it was one of the few games where you actually sat inside the game. And the concepts for the games were just so much more inventive than today. I don't think I've seen any games today that were much more fun than Frogger, Burger Time and Missile Command were back then.

As an added bonus, most video games from my youth actually used music, not just the various "umph" and "urgh" noises used in most today. My vote for the coolest video game theme of all time . . . Spy Hunter. Sure it wasn't original, ("Peter Gunn" by Henry Mancini) but it fit the game perfectly. To this day it is the only 50 cent game that I've ever thought was worth it.

The video game companies are realizing that some of these games can still find audiences today. The resurrection of games like Space Invaders and Donkey Kong, while not two of the best games from that era, are at least a good start.

I love the old games because they had certain qualities that you just don't see as much in the games of the '90s. First off, the old games started off easy and got harder, therefore building a sense of confidence that you actually have a chance. With games like Mortal Kombat, a beginner is dead in three seconds, and it cost 50 cents. I'm confused, this is fun?

Second, there was an element of skill involved. I realize people will argue this point, but if you think about it, these games today just don't require as much hand/eye coordination. If you press the buttons faster, you win — big whoop.

And lastly, there are the premises. Today's premises leave a lot to be desired. You can see the trend in how the arcade games are set up. Ninety percent of these games are two guys (or creatures) fighting each other, or using a gun attached to the outside to blow away as many of whatever (usually other people) as possible.

You can still find some of the older games if you just look hard enough. They're still around. It's just a little more difficult to find them. Look around in the corners of arcades and in the lobbies of pizza joints. Relive some childhood memories before these games fall of the face of the earth.

Oh, and they still cost just a quarter.

Dutch dating program unbuttons society

By Jenifer Chao
Associated Press

AMSTERDAM, Netherlands — If you're Dutch and your heart is broken, someone will listen to your problems. In fact, a nationwide television audience will eavesdrop.

Once a week, "All You Need Is Love" airs the hopes, dreams and disappointments of the lovelorn and love-shorn — all to the oohs and aahs of a voyeuristic studio audience.

Now in its third season, "All You Need" runs the gamut from heart-pounding, first-date excitement to heart-rending anguish that can make the casual viewer cringe.

Singles go on the show to be matched with dream dates, wounded rejects tell their gut-wrenching stories and hope to be reunited with their lost loves.

The show skims the surface of human emotions and avoids any deep exploration of participants' problems.

Tears flow and the audience sighs, but the weekly show's producers reject any suggestion they're exploiting the lonely for their 20 or so percent of the TV viewing audience.

"The show looks at how people live. We show normal relationships that everyone can relate to and recognize," said Martin Anders, spokesman for the John de Mol production company.

One apparent key to the show's success is its explicit rejection of the reticent behavior that is a hallmark of this intensely private society.

Marjon van der Laan appeared on a recent show to meet the unknown man she fell in love with at first sight in Amsterdam's Shipping Museum.

"All You Need" contacted the museum, tracked down her dream lover — Robert Fernandez, who worked for a drama group entertaining museum visitors — and invited him on the show.

After Marjon told her story, Robert came on stage to the wild applause of the studio audience. The two sat and chatted nervously, and then were given a gift certificate for a free night out.

The studio audience of about 300 is coached before the show: Polite applause for computer matchmaking segments, sympathetic sighing for sad stories, and tumultuous applause when people like Marjon meet the men of their dreams.

Esther Wouda, a tall, smiling blond in her 20s, came on the show to find what she called a "spontaneous, cheerful, adventurous and ambitious" sort of a guy. The production company found 15 men and closeted them with Esther for a brief get-acquainted session during the show.

At the end of the hour she picked 21-year-old Wanne Innemee. They got a free date too.

"All You Need" has spawned similar shows under license in Germany, Spain, Portugal, Italy and Scandinavia with a formula relying on heavy doses of personal vulnerability and video flashbacks.

Meet shy and tongue-tied Nipsi van der Vegt, 19, who's got a crush on his friend Natasha Knipscheer, 16. "All You Need" tapes him practicing his big line.

"I've fallen in love with you," the nervous teenager stammers into the camera. "I think you're beautiful . . . Would you be my girlfriend?"

But when he came face to face with Natasha at a concert, she put him down.

It was all caught on tape by "All You Need," and aired before the studio audience. Natasha didn't appear.

"I am glad she was honest," the spurned suitor told emcee Robert ten Brink.

The program attracts participants via a national hotline that draws up to 15,000 calls a week, according to show producer Etienne De Jong.

Ron ter Wijn and his girlfriend Marinne Bijsterveld were among them.

"Our relationship has reached a deadlock," a despondent Ron, 41, told emcee ten Brink in a video clip.

Ron mentioned his job problems and 29-year-old Marinne's bereavement over the recent death of her father.

University Dancers set to perform

COURTESY UNIVERSITY DANCERS

The University Dancers will be performing Friday and Saturday in Bowker Auditorium.

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

The music soars and the brightly lit stage appears to come alive as a flurry of dancers leap from behind the curtains. In a barrage of brightly colored leotards and floating scarves, the dancers swirl and dip to the music's hypnotic beat while the audience looks on in amazement. This is the power of dance.

On Dec. 1-3, the Pioneer Valley will have a chance to experience one of the world's most beautiful art forms when the University Dancers perform at Bowker Auditorium.

The dancers, comprised of students from UMass have worked in conjunction with top New York City choreographers and other Five College Dance faculty members this fall semester to put together a collage of talent.

The program was created by Dance Department faculty members Andrea Watkins and Billbob Brown.

It will begin with a piece entitled "The Breakdown of Talks," which was choreographed by the New York group KIPOS and specifically created by Daniel Tai and Aspassia Yaga utilizing techniques from the Erick Hawkins company.

The second program "Waves," is a piece based on aquatic life. Choreographed by Kathryn Posin the dance was created to physically challenge the dancers.

"We have worked hard this season to expose our students to top professionals in the field, to challenge the students technically and ideologically," said Brown in a press release.

Other dances that will be performed include Professor Watkins' "Snowy River Soliloquy" and "Quilt Dancer" "Required" and "Cleansing," with Professor Brown's "Sadhana" and Terese Freedman's "Things that Happen."

The University Dancers will perform at Bowker Auditorium Dec. 1-3 at 8 p.m. Tickets $7 general, $4 students or free with UMass ID, $2 Seniors. Tickets can be purchased at the Fine Art Center Box Office or at the door.

Film shows Romero's role in El Salvador turmoil

By Michelle Lugo
Collegian Staff

Two screenings of the movie Romero were shown last night in room 163 of the Campus Center. The event was sponsored by AHORA.

The movie Romero depicted the growing role of Archbishop Oscar Romero in the civil unrest in El Salvador, in the late 1970s. El Salvador was in the midst of civil unrest between the majority Indian and poor class, and the controlling rich elite, politicians and the rich.

"We wanted to show a movie that would speak of the history of El Salvador during those turbulent years," said junior Norma Rosa, president of the Spanish-speaking organization AHORA.

The movie Romero conveyed the religious aspect of the turmoil between the guerrillas and the controlling politicians.

After the murder of a priest, Romero took one of the first steps in his involvement in the conflict by cancelling Catholic masses in various towns and instead making the people congregate all in one cathedral to pay respects to the victims. In the movie Romero said it was to mourn, "a fine priest, an old man and a boy. They were equal and they were us. They were murdered and we must not let it happen again."

Another event that prompted the archbishop's involvement in the political controversy of El Salvador was when he refused to attend the inauguration of the new president elect, which influenced other church figures not to attend either.

"Somebody has to say enough," said Romero's character in the movie. The archbishop was portrayed as a peace maker sympathetic to the "liberation" movement but unwilling to advocate violence against government forces.

In another scene a line of people waited for Romero as peasant by peasant told the story and showed pictures to the archbishop of their "disappeared" loved ones.

Archbishop Romero was assassinated on March 25, 1980.

According to the movie, over 60,000 Salvadorians were killed between the years 1980 and 1989.

The movie Romero was released in 1989.

Romero's character was played by Puerto Rican actor Raul Julia, who died of stomach cancer this past October.

"This movie shows the reality of what happen in El Salvador as well as many Latin American countries, but that is only being uncovered now," said junior Miguel Rodriguez, director of activities for AHORA.

Shakur arrives in court 18 hours after being shot

By Tom Hays
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Bad-boy entertainer Tupac Shakur left the hospital 18 hours after being shot, then showed up today in court in a wheelchair to be on hand while a jury deliberated sex-assault charges against him. The 23-year-old rap singer and actor was wheeled into Manhattan's State Supreme Courthouse around 10 a.m. today. The jury, which has been sequestered, had deliberated while Shakur was hospitalized Wednesday after being shot in what police describe as a holdup. The deliberations were expected to continue today.

Wednesday evening, Shakur, bandaged and wearing a hospital gown and robe, was taken out of Bellevue Hospital by his mother. The decision to leave, 18 hours after being wounded five times and less than three hours after surgery, was against doctors' wishes, the hospital said.

Earlier, he told police he believed that he had been set up for the gunmen who shot him in the head, hand and groin, said a police source who spoke on condition of anonymity. Police have called the attack, in which $45,000 in cash and jewelry was stolen, a robbery.

Shakur's lawyer, Michael Warren, said common-sense would cause "a reasonable person to raise an eyebrow."

He also told the New York Post he thought it "more than a mere coincidence" that one of the first police officers at the scene was the officer who had arrested Shakur in the case now before the jury.

A call to Warren today for further comment was not returned immediately.

Shakur and another man, Charles Fuller, 24, are accused of sodomizing and sexually abusing a woman in their hotel room last year.

Judge Daniel Fitzgerald told the jurors that "circumstances beyond their control" had kept the defendants away from court on the second day of deliberations Wednesday.

problem is increasingly affecting the lives of women. Working in a drop-in center for gay, lesbian and bisexual youth in Seattle, Turkovsky noted that some lesbian and bisexual women were engaging in high risk behavior, including IV drug use, and unprotected sex. Women and men who have sex with these women seem to be unaware that they may be at risk for HIV/AIDS.

One of the reasons for this, said Turkovsky, is that women see the disease as a problem of gay and bisexual men, primarily older men. Ad campaigns, health services and society at large ignores the fact that like those men, they, too, are at risk for HIV.

The next phase

Because of this, health educators across the country are having to sit down and reevaluate the way they have been fighting the disease. Some organizations are experimenting with new approaches and altering their ad campaigns to try to catch the attention of those individuals who think they are still safe.

If these efforts are not successful and people cannot be made to make safe choices, said Hack, "The future doesn't look so good."

Men's gym to host UMass Open

Minutemen look to edge out Temple, who took first last year

By Jody King
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team will open it's season tomorrow night in the annual UMass Open gymnastics meet.

Gymnasts from Army, Syracuse, Penn State, Temple and Michigan are all among the strong competition that the Minutemen will be facing at the Curry Hicks Cage.

"Six top teams will be here for the Open," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. "We have never seen six teams competing at such a high level here together before."

The UMass team held an intrasquad meet two weeks ago in order to pick the line-up for the Open, as well as to see what areas of their competition needed improvement.

With the team's overall score of 211.80, UMass showed definite room for improvement on both the parallel bars and the high bar. But the Minutemen also gave the small crowd previews to the excitement they plan to provide and who will serve as the highlights on this year's squad.

"We're setting a goal for 221.80. That may be a little high for the Open, but I think we are capable, and it is definitely a possibility," Johnson said.

According to Johnson and assistant coach Steve Christensen, judging by the scores from the intrasquad competition, UMass will be looking for one to two point improvements across the board.

In the intrasquad competition on the pommel horse, the Minutemen had a few falls, and seemed to lack composure at times. Also, a trouble spot for UMass was the high bar. Coach Johnson noticed that the team lost interest and focus after the still rings.

But it was early, and the Minutemen have had two more weeks since then to polish their performance for tomorrow night's Open.

One of the highlights at the intrasquad meet was sophomore Chris Funk, who pulled off a beautiful routine on the high bar, incorporating a high level of skill and difficulty for a score of 9.60.

COLLEGIAN FILE

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team begins the season by hosting the annual UMass Open tomorrow night at the Curry Hicks Cage.

Also showing skill on the high bar was sophomore Kiat Oboler, who scored a 9.30. Oboler, according to Johnson, could be the guy that the Minutemen are looking for to step up.

Sophomore Gabe Columbus also proved to be a bright spot with his pommel horse routine. UMass' fourth high scorer on the event, Columbus scored a new personal best, beating his high score by a .10.

Freshman newcomer Kevin Schwartz also came out strong, showing his talent on the still rings. With a high level of difficulty throughout, his routine scored a 9.65 with his sharp and steady moves. A three-time national champion on the rings and a Junior Olympic athlete, Schwartz is expected to lead the Minutemen in the event.

"Kevin's routine at an international level would be close to a 10.," Johnson said.

Senior Pete Degenhardt and sophomores Bill Lorenz, Rus Shupak and Gabe Columbus lead the team on the floor exercise, all scoring above a 9.00 on the event.

"Scoring a 36.15 on the floor so early in the season is great. Our potential is there," Johnson said.

Tomorrow, UMass will look to step ahead of Temple, who took first in the Open last year.

"The level of performance we are seeing this season is higher than we have ever had," Johnson said. "We have a good shot at winning the UMass Open."

Swim team in NE meet

By Jamie Bearse
Collegian Staff

"The swimmers getting a shave is like climbing into bed with silk sheets."

That's what Bob Newcomb, coach of the University of Massachusetts women's swimming team, said about the pre-meet preparations going into this weekend's New England Championship Meet at the University of Rhode Island.

According to Newcomb, the team has "a shave" before every championship meet during the year when they shave off all body hair, giving them a "physical and mental advantage in the water."

"The shave is a phenomenal thing," Newcomb said. "it gives the swimmers a heightened sense and will reduce drag in the water this weekend."

The New England Championships for women's swimming this weekend is a traditional event that began in 1950 and now continues to be a local showcase of talent that will feature some of Massachusetts' brightest stars.

At the top of the list is freshman sensation, Karen Sonnwald, who will be the top seed in the 500-yard freestyle and the 1650-yard freestyle.

"Karen is untried and this will be her first competitive meet," Newcomb said. "It will be interesting to see how well she'll do."

According to Newcomb, junior less Griffith is expected to give a "solid" performance in the 50, 100 and 200-yard breaststroke.

"Jess is right up there with the best breaststrokers in the region, she'll be a high seed," Newcomb said.

Sarah Baker and senior Barbara Banks will round out the Massachusetts' "big four" this weekend and are expected to be high seeds come meet time.

"The shave is a phenomenal thing. It gives the swimmers a heightened sense and will reduce drag in the water this weekend."
–Coach Bob Newcomb

"Baker constantly improves, she's having a great season, the coaches at New England's this weekend don't expect her to be a threat," Newcomb said. "But I expect her to surprise a lot of people."

Banks is the school record holder in the 100-yard backstroke and will be a huge threat to win the event at the New England's, not to mention the 200-yard backstroke.

Sophomores Barbara Hickey and Jessica Farley could also "surprise some people" this weekend along with freshman upstart Danielle Mitchell, according to Newcomb.

"Mitchell has been coming along well in the past two weeks," Newcomb said. "She starting to swim the way she's capable."

According to Newcomb, the women are in a "high energy level" for this weekend not only because of "the shave" but also of something called "secret psychers."

Secret psychers happens the night before all the championship meets when all the swimmers draw names out the hat and give presents and complimentary quotes to the swimmer they draw.

"Secret psychers draws the team closer together and everyone gets to know everyone else's goals," Newcomb said. "It's interesting how giving out little motivational things brings the energy level up."

The Minutewomen will need to be pumped. Last year, they finished third in a condensed roster of six. This year, there will be ten teams, and Newcomb aims to finish fourth.

"We'll be in the top five somewhere. I don't know how well some of these will do," Newcomb said, "UConn should run away with it, but after that we'll be right there fighting with BC, Providence and Maine for second."

According to Newcomb, the New England's are not something the Minutewomen are "aiming for" in accomplishing their best times.

"Our best swimming will come in February," Newcomb said, "But we'll use this meet to see where we stand against local competition, we could surprise a lot of people."

Track has chance to get feet wet at UNH

Minutewomen battle Northeastern without most x–c runners

By Allison Connolly
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's indoor track and field team will compete against Northeastern University at New Hampshire on Saturday.

For Massachusetts Coach Julie LaFreniere, it will be the perfect opportunity for her team to get their feet wet.

"Overall, Northeastern has a strong program," LaFreniere said. "They are stronger in jumps and sprints but not in long distance. We are a lot stronger in field events, especially hurdling. We will hold our own."

For the meet, the team will not be using their full potential. Most of the cross country runners will be absent for a rest after their regular fall season.

"This will be the first time to see how our track kids will do after two months of training," LaFreniere said. "Our top cross country runners have had a long season and need some rest."

In the 20-pound weight-throwing event, junior Christie Martin will be returning as a favorite. The team will miss sophomore Stephanie Townson, who will not compete but will be compensated by the skills of transfer Samantha Robinson and freshman Shana Mitchell, who is new to the event.

Shotput will feature Martin and junior pentathlete Kenku will run the 400m open along with freshman Christen McCabe. In the 800m, former A-10 Champion Kerry Aker and junior Jen Waeger will compete. Freshman Rebecca Donaghue will not be able to run due to lower leg problems.

The 3000m will see a solid line-up of senior Julie Morcau, sophomore Molly Dunlap and freshmen Christy Martin and Kirsten Bringardner. The 4x400m will have Whitaker with the lead, Rutherford, O'Neil and anchor Kanku. The 4x800m will have Aker, Lyons, Waeger and Donaghue.

"This will be the first time to see how our track kids will do after two months of training. Our top cross country runners have had a long season and need some rest."
–Coach Julie LaFreniere

In the high jump, Northeastern is stronger. UMass will have Danielle Picchio and senior Janey Meeks. However, UMass will have the advantage in the triple jump with Meeks again and freshman Rosemarie Bryan.

Bryan will also compete in the long jump, previously leaping 18 feet in an intrasquad meet. Picchio and freshman Stacie Lavoie will jump along with Bryan.

In the hurdles, last season's record setter Anya Forrest will run with O'Neil, Lavoie and sophomore Jesse Rutherford. Emma Gardiner will be the only entry for UMass in the 55- yard dash. In the 1500 meters, senior cross country runner Cheryl Lyons will run with or without sophomore Kristin Donaldson, who did well in cross country but suffers from leg problems and is questionable at this time.

No. 1 Massachusetts ready for first Wooden Classic

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will put its first ever No. 1 ranking on the line tomorrow afternoon when they take on No. 7 Kansas in the first-ever John Wooden Classic at the Pond in Anaheim, Calif.

This game will give the Minutemen a chance to avenge last year's 86-75 loss to Kansas in the championship game of the Preseason NIT.

However, UMass senior co-captain Lou Roe disputes the idea that UMass is using revenge as a factor.

"They beat us last year. So what?" Roe said. "This is a new year, and new season. We have the same team, but a new atmosphere surrounding the team. We're all focused. I think Kansas is going to have some trouble going against us on Saturday."

For the second year in a row, UMass will take on Kansas following an upset of the nation's No. 1 team. But on paper, the Minutemen look like a favorite in the rematch.

Kansas lost their two leading scorers in forward Richard Scott, who was the MVP of the NIT, and Steve Woodberry from last year's squad. The duo combined for 28 points against UMass. The Minutemen return all five starters from a year ago, and will have the advantage of having sophomore All-America Candidate Marcus Camby in the line-up. The 6-foot-11-inch center was sidelined from last year's game after sustaining a knee injury in UMass' upset of then No. 1 North Carolina.

"It hurt not playing last year," Camby said. "I have a lot to prove."

In between the North Carolina game and the Kansas tilt last year, the Minutemen had one day (Thanksgiving) to prepare for the Jayhawks. With a week between the Arkansas game and this weekend's contest, the UMass players are more confident entering the game and dispute any idea that they may suffer a let down after the high points of beating Arkansas and receiving their first ever No. 1 ranking.

"I don't think there is going to be a let down," said junior forward Donta Bright. "We didn't have enough time to prepare last year. With this week to prepare for Kansas, we'll be ready."

"We're proud of being No. 1," Roe said. "but it's not good enough. We're still a hungry team."

Two players who will be in the Kansas lineup that hurt the Minutemen in last year's game are center Greg Ostertag and sophomore point guard Jacque Vaughn.

Ostertag took advantage of the injury to Camby, scoring 13 points and grabbing 12 rebounds. Last year's contest served as a coming out party for Vaughn. In only his fourth collegiate game, the freshman guard dished out 10 assists and scored 11 points against Massachusetts.

"Vaughn is fast," said Bright. "He makes plays. We'll just try to contain him."

One thing that hindered UMass in last year's game was their shooting, specifically from the free throw line. The team focused on their shooting during the off-season and Calipari has been pleased with the results.

"Every guy is shooting better," Calipari said. "We're shooting with confidence. Everybody worked on it. Every guy is going up expecting to make shot."

PAUL BLODEAU / COLLEGIAN

Derek Kellogg (14) will look to control the ball for the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team as it takes on Kansas tomorrow in the John Wooden Classic.

"We're proud of being No. 1, but it's not good enough. We're still a hungry team."
–Forward Lou Roe

Both coaches pointed to rebounding as the key to the game.

"[Kansas'] main priority is rebounding," Calipari said. "All they are doing is rebounding drills. When they go to breakfast and get cereal, they're boxing each other out. They're going to be a great rebounding club. Their only job is to keep our guys of the class."

"UMass is one of the best, if not the best rebounding teams in the nation," said Kansas Coach Roy Williams. "If we rebound like we did in [our first game], UMass will beat us by 40 points."

The Wooden Classic is promoting itself as one of the premier college basketball exhibitions of the year and has rolled out the red carpet. Joining Massachusetts and Kansas are traditional powerhouses UCLA and Kentucky, who will play in the second game of the tournament. All four teams will be paraded through Disneyland in the "Wooden Parade" this afternoon.

Massachusetts and Kansas will play at the early starting time of 10 a.m. [West Coast time] in order to allow NBC to broadcast at 1 p.m. on the East Coast.

Minutewomen the underdog this weekend at Vanderbilt

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

With several key wins over nationally-ranked teams, the University of Massachusetts sports teams have proven this year that the underdog role is one they can thrive in.

The UMass women's basketball team will take on that underdog role this weekend when they battle Vanderbilt, the nation's No. 12 team, on its court in Nashville, Tenn. tonight in the first round of the MCI — First American Classic Tournament.

"It will be tough playing them down in Nashville," Massachusetts Coach Joanie O'Brien said. "But we have nothing to lose, and they have everything to lose. One advantage we have is that they have not seen [sophomore point guard] Sabriya [Mitchell] play."

"The thing that separates the top teams from the rest is the intensity they can play with all the time . . . It's a big game for us. We'll have to play a perfect game to win."
–Coach Joanie O'Brien

The winner of the UMass-Vanderbilt game will meet the victor of a Wake Forest-Tennessee State matchup Saturday in the championship game. The two losing teams will face off in a consolation game to be played Saturday.

"They are all some tough teams," O'Brien said. "Wake Forest is a good solid program, and Tennessee State was an NCAA participant last season."

The Minutewomen are 0-2 on the young season after falling to host Kentucky 73-55 in the first round of last weekend's Lady Kats Invitational in Lexington, and then losing a heartbreaker to Eastern Michigan 56-55 in the consolation game.

UMass has played Vanderbilt only once in its history. That matchup was last season at the William D. Mullins Center, where the Minutewomen fell to the Commodores 77-50. Forward Octavia Thomas led UMass with 18 points, while Melissa Gurile corralled 11 rebounds.

The Minutewomen will be looking to those same players to produce this time around. Both are coming off a big tournament last weekend. Gurile scored 19 points and grabbed eight rebounds against Eastern Michigan, and Thomas poured in 15 while collecting nine boards. Sophomore guard Beth Kuzmeski, on the strength of four three-pointers, led UMass with 16 points against the Lady Kats of Kentucky.

"The thing that separates the top teams from the rest is the intensity they can play with all the time, and their consistency," O'Brien said.

Vanderbilt definitely qualifies as one of those top teams. The Commodores finished last season with a sparkling 25-8 record, and return three starters, although they did lose 6-foot-10-inch center Heidi Gillingham to graduation.

Returning for Coach Jim Foster's squad will include senior forward Kelly Dougherty, who averaged 9.6 points per game last season, and junior Sheri Sam [9.2 ppg., 6.2 rpg. last year].

Vanderbilt also returns 6-foot-4-inch junior Mara Cunningham, who was a medical redshirt last year after suffering serious injuries in a car accident, and has made a return to the Commodore lineup.

"It's a big game for us," O'Brien said. "We'll have to play a perfect game to win."

For Tennessee State, the three top returners are senior Carolyn Aldridge, who averaged 18.7 ppg last season, junior Connie Swift [15.8 ppg] and senior Latessa Kickerson.

The Lady Tigers were 20-9 last year under head coach Teresa Phillips.

Wake Forest is the only of the four participating schools coming off a losing season. The Demon Deacons, 8-19 last season, lost only one starter from last year's squad, and are led by junior forwards Val Hodge [12.3 ppg, 6.4 rpg] and sophomore RaeAnna Mulholland [12.4 ppg, 6.2 rpg].

Weakened Warriors hobble into Mullins

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

When the University of Massachusetts and Merrimack College square off tonight at the Mullins Center, it may appear more like a hockey exhibition game than a Hockey East clash.

UMass will be without forwards Rob Bonneau (the team's leading scorer), alternate captain Mike Evans and role player Gerry Cahill, who were suspended for one game for fighting in a 7-4 loss at Boston University on Nov. 19.

UMass will likely welcome back two long-absent upperclassmen, junior winger Sal Manganaro and senior defenseman Brian Corcoran. Manganaro, a prized Boston College transfer and UMass' most experienced player (50 appearances in two seasons at BC), injured his knee in the season opener at UMass-Lowell and has been out ever since. Coach Joe Mallen said Manganaro has "looked great" in practice all week and hoped the team physicians would deem him eligible following yesterday's practice.

Corcoran has been busy the last few months winning the Yankee Conference Defensive Player of the Year Award for Mike Hodges' football squad, but is almost ready to lend his bruising, 6-foot-2-inch, 247 pound frame to the blueline.

"[Corcoran's] skating is a lot better this year," Mallen said. "Last year he was almost rusty. But he really has a desire to play hockey and make an impact on this team."

Dave Kilduff will start in goal for UMass tonight.

Coach Ron Anderson's Merrimack ranks have been heavily depleted, and the worst of the casualties is standout sophomore goaltender Martin Legault, who has not practiced all week. Legault burst onto the conference scene as a very bright spot for HE's last place entry in 1993-94, recording a .892 save percentage and 3.77 goals against average, gaudy statistics for a freshman on a thin roster.

The diminutive, Gloucester, Ontario native (5-foot-8- inches, 173 pounds) nearly mirrored his first year performance through 11 games this season (4.10, .887), but the netminding responsibilities now fall on fellow sophomore Eric Thibeault, used sparingly the past two years.

"We're struggling right now," Anderson said. "We're fortunate we only played one game last week [a 5-2 win over Salem State], so we've had a little break and time to regroup a bit."

Regrouping, however, will not bring to health senior captain Mark Cornforth, tied for the team lead in points (three goals, nine assists), or any of MC's five other players who did not dress versus Salem State, none of whom is certain to skate this weekend.

A corps of young Warriors are laying the foundation for the future in North Andover. Sophomore forward Rob Beck leads the team with seven goals and freshman forward Casey Kesselring has made immediate strides (6-4-10), winning the conference's Rookie of the Week Award November 7.

When junior rearguard Dan Hodge was declared academically ineligible for the Fall semester and senior blueliner Chris Ross was injured last week, added defensive duties were passed to sophomore Eric Weichselbaumer, a converted forward (0-11-11), and Steve McKenna, an aggressive (36 penalty minutes) but productive (six assists) defender.

While the extra ice time for the underclassmen may pay dividends later on, Mallen feels a confrontation with a team as young as his may be to UMass' advantage.

"This should be a great weekend for us from the standpoint of, 'How far along have we come?'" Mallen said. "I think we're the underdog in every game we play this year, but [Merrimack's] young and that's something we have to look at optimistically."

Tonight's game can be heard on WMUA, 91.1 FM. Union Video Center will rebroadcast tonight's NESN coverage next Monday and Thursday, and on Tuesday and Friday UVC will air its own broadcast of Saturday's game.

Each school will play at least four matches, one against each team in its pool. The team in each pool with the best record will advance to the semi-finals on Sunday, and the two winners of those match-ups will battle it out in the final on Sunday afternoon for the NIVC title.

The Minutewomen battle 18-12 Fresno State this morning, and will face Idaho State (18-9) at 2 p.m.

Tomorrow, UMass tangles with 17-15 Arkansas in the morning, and will wrap up with a contest against 20-10 Iowa State at 2 p.m.

Professor's lecture could test speech policy

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

The visit of a Wellesley College professor to the University of Massachusetts tomorrow will test the chancellor's new policy on campus free speech.

The policy, still in draft form, was put together for Chancellor David K. Scott by a group headed by Deputy Chancellor Marcellette G. Williams. It is sided toward the right of free speech as a necessity to intellectual discourse.

The introduction of the statement on freedom of speech reads in part, "We believe it is our responsibility to espouse an atmosphere of free speech and free inquiry and to advocate for the timely discussion of a wide variety of issues. We believe, further, that vital intellectual discourse is essential to democracy and to ensuring a just society."

The draft of a potential policy on freedom of speech and Scott's statement was published in Friday's edition of The Campus Chronicle.

Tomorrow's visit from Dr. Anthony Martin, an African- American history professor at Wellesley, will test the limits of the newly-drafted statement. Martin is seen by many as an anti-Semite.

"We are bringing him [Martin] here for one purpose and one purpose only — Black empowerment," said Justin Harris, president of the Lamda Nu chapter of Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity, Inc., the group organizing Martin's visit. "I don't expect everyone to understand what he is saying."

Martin will speak at 7:30 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium on "Black Leaders Under Siege," which Harris said will be a historical discussion of Black leaders under siege in many facets of society.

Harris said his organization did consider the impact Martin's appearance would have on the Jewish community, but he said people must be willing to listen to what Martin has to say before passing judgement.

"He is not tearing down any bridges," Harris said. "He is building them up."

The Hillel Council will not give a statement regarding Martin's appearance until tomorrow night after Martin has given his speech, according to Alan Weinfeld, a member of the Hillel's executive board.

Scott said in a statement he hopes the campus community will test and debate Martin's ideas.

"We will fail as an educational institution if we do not test Professor Martin's ideas and the ideas of all speakers against customary standards of scholarship," Scott wrote.

Martin uses the book The Secret Relationship Between Blacks and Jews, produced by the Nation of Islam, in his African studies class. The book illustrates Jewish involvement in the trans-Atlantic slave trade and African slavery.

Martin, a 21-year veteran of Wellesley College, has come under fire from both colleagues at Wellesley as well as the media for his teachings.

In an editorial last April, The Boston Globe said Martin "has seemed to abandon the path of knowledge."

Martin is also author of the book The Jewish Onslaught: Despatches from the Wellesley Battlefront. In response to the book, Wellesley College President Diana Chapman Walsh issued a statement in which she said the contents of the book were "distorted and unfounded accusations."

"We must speak out against the content of this particular book. It violates the basic principles that nourish and sustain this college community and that enable us to achieve our education goals.

"Professor Martin's book crosses the line from simply unpopular or controversial argument to unnecessarily disrespectful and deeply divisive speech that must be countered, however, strong the temptation not to dignify it with a response," Walsh wrote.

The draft of the statement on free speech regarding the UMass campus is still up for discussion. Scott said in his statement he is making the statement available to the community and is looking for endorsements from governance groups.

Scott said afterwards he will take the statement to University President Michael K. Hooker and the Board of Trustees.

The foundation for the free speech statement came in large part from the University of Michigan's policy.

Three dorms encounter fire–related problems

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Three University of Massachusetts dormitories were visited by the Amherst Fire Department on Saturday, on three different counts of fire–related problems.

Actual fires erupted in two dorm rooms, one in Kennedy and one in Baker, and smoke from a small grill was the call for alarm in Wheeler, according to Danny Chun, a spokesman for the UMass News Office.

There were no injuries in any of the three incidents, but damages to the two rooms that caught fire caused the residents of the rooms to be relocated to other rooms on campus, Chun said. The estimated combined damages are $2,500.

The residents of room 216 at Wheeler dorm had a small charcoal grill mounted on the window sill removed after its smoke set off the smoke alarm on the fourth floor, Chun said.

The Amherst Fire Department, UMass Environmental Health and Safety and UMass Public Safety all responded to Saturday night's alarms, Chun said.

The smoke detector alarm went off in Kennedy at 4:57 p.m. from a fire in room 1518, and heat detectors set off the room's sprinklers, Chun said. Damages are estimated at $2,000.

"I heard people outside screaming to get out, and the guy living there came running out," Lisa Dunn, a junior legal studies major who lives on the 15th floor of Kennedy, said. "The room is really burned badly."

A lit candle ignited a blanket on the upper edition to a bunk bed. The blanket ignited the mattress and pillows on both beds, as well as a clock on an adjacent desk, Chun said.

The sprinkler system put the fire out. The fire department used smoke ejectors to clean the smoke off of the floor, to avoid smoke damage in other rooms, according to Amherst Fire Captain Edward Brace.

The smoke detector alarm went off in Baker at 11:10 p.m. from a fire in room 344, and when officials arrived they found a resident trying to put the fire out with a fire extinguisher, Chun said.

Damages are estimated at $500.

Smoking material had been left smoldering in the room for about an hour, prior to the fire, Chun said. Cloth on top of a storage trunk caught fire, and the heat melted the carpeting, resulting in black smoke.

The fourth floor smoke detector alarm went off in Wheeler at 5:47 p.m., Chun said. There was no fire, just a charcoal grill that was disemminating smoke.

The grill was confiscated, as well as a live Christmas tree found in the room. Both items are in violation of fire codes in dorm rooms, Chun said.

Chun said that UMass Environmental Health and Safety regularly sends out fire bulletins with tips and suggestions on how to avoid these kinds of problems.

Problem of worldwide hunger set to be addressed

Free banquet to be held at Earthfoods with 'hope to raise awareness' tonight

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

While a hunger banquet may seem contradictory in terms, organizers of this evening's event hope participants will come away with a greater insight to the world–wide hunger problem.

"We hope to raise awareness of hunger in the world and the unequal distribution of resources world–wide," according to Mirna Torres, a coordinator of the event and chair of the MassPIRG committee on hunger and homelessness.

The Hunger Banquet is free and open to the public and will give students a taste of what the problem means, according to Torres.

One of the goals of the event is to raise awareness of the problem of hunger not in the context of a lack of food to feed the world population, but that there is an unequal distribution of food. Torres said there is enough food in the world to feed almost all of the population.

"A lot of people think the problem of hunger is because there is not enough food," Torres said. "The real problem is the food is not distributed equally."

According to statistics provided by MassPIRG, 40,000 children die everyday from hunger–related causes and 33 million people suffer from hunger.

The banquet will begin with two speakers, Nelson Acosta of the Office of Third World Affairs and Professor Julie Caswell of the Resource Economics Department. Both will be speaking generally on the problem of world hunger.

After the speakers finish, Torres said participants will be given a meal based on slips of colored paper which will represent income levels and determine the amount of food given. The food will be provided in part by Earthfoods.

Fifteen percent of the participants, representing the top income level, will be given a balanced meal consisting of a salad, an entree, potato, rice and apple cider.

Twenty–five percent of the participants, representing the middle income bracket, will be given salad, potato, rice and apple cider.

The bottom income bracket, representing the 60 percent of the population will be given rice and water as a meal.

The colored paper will be given out randomly to participants.

"Hopefully people will notice this is not fair," said Torres. "It is random and can happen to anyone."

Torres said the value of the banquet is to make students aware on a first–hand basis the problem of unequal food distribution, but she said there are limits to the experience because students can always go home and eat a snack if they leave the banquet hungry.

"Even if you do leave hungry, you can go home and get a snack. Many people do not have that option," she said.

The banquet is a first time event, but Torres said she hopes it becomes annual.

The event will be held from 6:30 p.m. to 8 p.m. in Earthfoods located in the Student Union. Torres said there will be enough food for about 200 participants.

Sponsors of the event include MassPIRG, the International Student Association, AHORA, Earthfoods, the Office of Third World Affairs, and the Student Government Association.

Fraternity welcomes Scott, staff to speak at open forum

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

Chancellor David K. Scott will get a taste of the Greek area life at the University of Massachusetts tonight, when he visits the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity house to field questions and hear students concerns at an open forum.

Scott will be treated to dinner after which a Greek Area– University relations forum will occur beginning at 6:30 p.m. All students are welcome to attend the forum.

"The whole purpose of the forum is to provide students an opportunity to ask questions or raise concerns with the chancellor and vice chancellor," said Jay Bragg of Phi Epsilon, the organizer of the event. "We encourage all students to attend."

The Greek Area is concerned that the positive work they do for the community is being overshadowed by a bad reputation of fraternities, according to Matt Kapszukiewicz.

"We do a lot of good things, but people don't see our positive attributes," Kapszukiewicz said. "People don't see the community service work the Greek Area does or the strong academics in our community."

The Greek Area is trying to turn that reputation around. The forum is a good way to discuss the possible ways in which the University feels the Greeks can improve, and change their reputation, according to Kapszukiewicz.

"We want to ask the Chancellor what does he want us to do," Kapszukiewicz said. "There are approximately 1200 students in the Greek Area. That's a lot of people power who can go out and do community service."

Scott will be joined at the forum, which is being sponsored by Phi Epsilon, by Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Tom Robinson as well as other administrators, faculty and staff.

Phi Epsilon has also invited representatives from various areas on campus including the UMass police department and the bursar and financial aid offices.

The forum will be held at the Phi Epsilon fraternity house at 57 Olympia Drive near the Mather Career Center.

Trafficking of females is discussed by author at Women's Conference

"The best way to fight and take revenge was to organize better, to make the people politically aware, and to struggle to free our country once and for all from the imperialist yoke," read a banner in the Campus Center Auditorium during the 1994 Women's Conference.

This banner expressed the overall theme of "Voices of the Majority: Women Against Oppression," the conference held on Saturday at the University of Massachusetts.

One topic discussed included "We Are Not For Sale — Sex Trafficking in the World." About 100 people filled the Campus Center Auditorium, as keynote speaker Ninotchka Rosca was introduced to the audience.

Rosca, a world–renowned writer and activist from the Philippines, said that military racism towards women continues in developing nations, and that little has changed about the New World Order.

Rosca continued as she discussed the new Gender Agreement Traffic and Trade Document, otherwise known as GATT.

This 22,000–page document, signed on Apr. 15, 1994, by the United States Government, has been created to ensure the that illegal trafficking of women does not take place.

Rosca expressed how disappointed she was in GATT, saying that trafficking of women in the world is indeed

Conference focuses on how women must deal with different issues

"A people is not defeated until the hearts of all its women are on the ground." This traditional Cheyenne saying graced the program cover of the 1994 Women's Conference, "Voices of the Majority: Women Against Oppression", held this past weekend at the Campus Center Auditorium.

Two concurrent panels were formed following the introduction, "Women in the New International Order: The Struggle in Context" and "Women in Health Care."

Dalila Balfour, a social worker from the State Department of Health, discussed her ideas for reforming the health care system as it applies to women's issues.

Balfour has worked in Honduras and in the U.S. for over a decade focusing on the health needs of the Latino community. Her work entails grassroots organizing, using participatory models to educate people about AIDS, its relation to the sex industry, and substance addiction.

"We must work together in the fields of prostitution, sex abuse, and drug use," Balfour said. "We must think about the future of the country and what we can do as a whole."

Balfour urges health care workers to identify those sociological factors that make some communities more vulner-

Dollar reaches highest point in seven weeks

NEW YORK (AP) — The dollar surged against the Japanese yen Friday, closing above the key 100-yen level for the first time in seven weeks, in a move that many analysts said signaled the U.S. currency's long-awaited recovery.

Data released in Tokyo and Washington pointed to changes in economic fundamentals that according to currency market participants should shift the global flow of capital back toward U.S. assets and drive up demand for the dollar.

"We're seeing a fundamental reappraisal of the dollar," said Robert Brusca, chief financial economist at Nikko Securities Co. International Inc. "It's turned a pretty important corner." In late New York trading, the dollar was quoted at 100.61 yen, up from 99.34 late Thursday. It was the currency's first close above 100 yen since Oct. 11 and the highest since Oct. 7. In London, the dollar rose to 100.36 yen from 99.35. In Tokyo, where the trading day begins, the U.S. currency finished the week at 99.58 yen.

Stocks make gains, inflation fears end

NEW YORK (AP) — Stocks posted strong gains on Friday, as bonds staged a surprising rally and pushed interest rates lower amid new confidence that inflation is under control.

Traders also said the market was staging a technical rebound from sharp losses earlier this week.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 44.75 to 3,745.62, reversing a 38-point loss on Thursday and ending the week with a 37-point gain.

The 30-year bond shot up 1 3-16 points, pushing its yield down to 7.90 percent. Bonds rallied despite an unexpectedly strong November employment report, which showed the nation's unemployment rate dropping 0.2-percentage point to 5.6 percent.

Analysts said that data might have signaled that the economy was growing at an inflationary pace, and could encourage the Federal Reserve to further raise short-term interest rates.

Crops make gains, export demands high

CHICAGO (AP) — Grain and soybean futures prices rose strongly Friday on the Chicago Board of Trade on signs of brisk export demand.

Soybeans reversed a three-day slide after the Agriculture Department reported U.S. soybean exports totaled 60,000 metric tons last week, a robust figure according to Victor Lespinasse, assistant vice president in the grain trading division of Dean Witter, Discover & Co.

Soybeans also were bolstered by a sharp increase in Malaysian palm oil futures overseas and higher bids for soybean oil in Rotterdam, the main port of entry for U.S. farm goods into Europe. Wheat futures rose for the third straight day on expectations for new export sales to Egypt or China. Egypt denied rumors it was planning to bid this weekend for up to 500,000 metric tons of U.S. wheat at subsidized prices, but prices refused to fall.

"To me, that suggests some business is right around the corner," Lespinasse said.

Corn futures gained on news that China has temporarily halted corn exports to preserve grain for domestic use.

University Store readies itself for holiday season

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts' University Store is working at marketing the interests and needs of students in a way which will bring in profits and make the holiday season less stressful for student shoppers.

They are creating gift ideas, geared towards a variety of different religious holidays, and displaying merchandise on the Campus Center Concourse, according to Mary Ellen Martin, assistant merchandise manager for the University Store.

"Anything we carry, we watch the seasons and the trends to see what the market's needs are," Martin said.

The store currently has a table set up on the concourse to sell UMass basketball t-shirts, Martin said.

The team had its big win against Arkansas, and the University Store rushed to respond to the market's needs for paraphernalia commemorating the event, Martin said.

"You follow what's happening, and react on it as fast as you can so you can capitalize on it," Martin said.

Having the t-shirts displayed on the Concourse was the store's way of using the "Concourse as a tool," Martin said.

This method of sales seems to be working, according to Rebecca Bucar, a sophomore civil engineering major who works at the t-shirt table.

"A lot of people came knowing they wanted them," Bucar said, "but a lot of people are surprised to see them, and get all excited."

Books and clothing will be sold on the Concourse for the rest of the semester. This puts the merchandise in the forefront, and draws clientele in, Martin said.

For people who have time to kill between classes, they can stop at the tables to browse — and many end up shopping, according to Laura Mannix, a sophomore communications major who works at the book table.

Other marketing strategies employed by the University Store include catering to different religions and putting gift ideas and displays at the front of the store, Martin said.

"This summer we found a Judaic gift supplier, so we have a lot of Chanukah stuff this year," Martin said.

The store is also selling cards for Kwanza, which is an African–American celebration of family, harvest and good fortune, Martin said.

The front of the store is decorated with a Christmas theme, Martin said.

"I've worked a six-hour shift and have only sold one menorah," said Stacey Greckmore, an undecided freshman working at a University Store front register. "Sometimes it helps to have things up front, people come by and grab stuff."

UM alum is helping create a fax–o–rama

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

A new company started by a University of Massachusetts alumnus is providing a new technology known as fax–on–demand.

Fax–on–demand is a technology which allows businesses to store information about their products or services for customers on computer systems.

Customers who have fax machines can then call the computer system and receive faxes.

InstantFAX provides the service to small businesses which can not afford the expense of operating the technology themselves.

Large corporations like Intel operate their own fax–on–demand services. Intel, the leading microprocessor producer, provides various product information through a fax–on–demand system.

"For small operations like mine I can use a PC to provide the service," Christopher Kopec, owner and University alumnus, said.

According to Kopec, large firms operate fax–on–demand through large mainframes.

InstantFAX was founded this past September by Kopec, who received a bachelor degree in philosophy in May 1992. His father tried to start a similar enterprise in the autumn of 1993 on Martha's Vineyard.

InstantFAX charges companies $29.95 a month to provide the service.

Kopec said he felt that fax–on–demand technology has great potential.

"Telecommunications is a growing industry," Kopec said.

According to Kopec, fax–on–demand lowers costs for small and large firms alike, but the larger firms benefit more.

Many of InstantFAX's customers right now are local real estate firms, but Kopec hopes to provide fax–on–demand menus of local restaurants.

Kopec also aspires to expand InstantFAX and become a reseller and support service of the technology to large firms. According to Kopec, most large firms already have the technology or will have it in the near future.

Besides offering fax–on–demand services to local businesses, InstantFAX offers voice mail services to local households.

Kopec said the voice mail system is ideal for students who live off–campus.

Professor sees little peace movement

By Juan Jose Chacon Quiros de Quetzalcoatl
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Veteran Hampshire College Professor Eqbal Ahmad condemned the gay and women's movements and other "identity politics" in a public talk at Hampshire College on Thursday night.Speaking on "The US and the World at Century's End," Ahmad declared that the peace movement in the United States was dead and had been replaced by identity politics.

Referring to the war in Bosnia as "the first great holocaust after the Second World War," he said that demonstrations by women and gay movements in Washington were silent on the war in Bosnia. "On that day I knew that identity politics had overcome the peace movement of this country. Once the threat of thermonuclear war was gone, nobody could care whether a holocaust will happen or will not happen," Ahmad said.

"I cannot explain the behavior of the women's movement or the gay movement in any terms other than that they don't feel frightened anymore."

Ahmad said that nonetheless there was hope in the world because he had been told that a Hampshire College basketball team had beaten a team from UMass. "If Hampshire College can beat UMass at basketball, then, by golly the world can change," said Ahmad, pounding the podium.

Ahmad spoke of changes in the world order since the end of the Cold War, citing an end to the strategic arms race, bipolarity, and the threat of nuclear war.

He also pointed out some current similarities with the nineteenth century, including the return of nationalism, and a game of balance of power in Europe. "If nationalisms are hugely around, can National Socialism be far away?" he asked.

Ahmad said that the revisionist view that U.S. behavior during the Cold War was not really about the fight against communism and more about imperialism had been proven right.

He said that the biggest recent gains had been made by the United States in the Middle East, but were "all potentially very temporary gains."

"The so-called peace in the Middle East is founded on American and Israeli injustice and the stupidity of Arab leaders."

He described Yassir Arafat as "the most stupid, who surrendered to the Israelis, saying 'O.K. sir, you are God, you are master, I submit to you, do me good."

During the question and answer period, Ahmad denied that during the build-up to the Gulf War in 1990, he had called for some Third World states to build nuclear weapons.

He also stated that the American attack on Iraq was "clearly an imperialist intervention, but it was not wrong."

"The intention, the designs, the goals were imperial, but it wasn't wrong because Saddam Hussein gave them a chance to do so," Ahmad said.

Group rally hopes to get students involved

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

To promote the University of Massachusetts as a "community that serves," Volunteers Involved in Vital Action (VIVA) held a preliminary meeting last week for their upcoming rally and conference.

The Dec. 1 meeting held at the Newman Center was intended to bring together campus student organizations to discuss ideas for a rally in March, said Lori McKinney, one of the rally coordinators from VIVA.

According to McKinney, the rally will kick off at noon with speakers and a recognition of organizations who have done community service. Following the rally will be a three–hour seminar for student organizations interested in learning more about community service.

"For example, one of the [seminar] choices might be if you're a group on campus, how you can cut through the red– tape of the administration to get things done," McKinney said.

Last Thursday's meeting brought out other seminar topic ideas, what the format of the rally and conference would be, and suggestions on how to get students to attend, McKinney said.

"It went well, I got calls from six groups, there were 12 [people] there," said McKinney. "That's 15–20 potential people. Each person represents a group they're in."

Groups represented ranged from registered student organizations (RSOs) and student groups, to fraternities, said McKinney.

"I would like to have seen more participants," said Michael Guthrie, a coordinator for the event and a representative from the Mortar Board, a senior's honor society.

Guthrie said he was pleased with the 12 people that did come, but a large campus–wide representation would be more effective.

"The reason we had a meeting was to find out what would bring in students in March," Guthrie said.

The small student turn–out in the meeting represents a larger problem within VIVA, Guthrie said.

According to Guthrie, VIVA was designed as a bridge between University administration and student groups for community service, but because of small student participation, VIVA has not accomplished that.

"To have only administration on that board is pathetic," said Guthrie. "I would really like to see more students there."

McKinney said one of the reasons for the lack of students at the meeting was because people feel it is a large commitment.

"People are really busy, and they don't have time to commit," said McKinney. "But it's not a big commitment. People should know they can call anytime to give us ideas."

VIVA had attempted a similar rally last spring, but did not get the student turn–out they had hoped for, said McKinney.

"Last year's conference turned out not to be as student focused, and that has changed," said McKinney.

McKinney said the seminar ideas, and the keynote speakers are not definite yet, but Chancellor David K. Scott will be speaking.

"I think the most important thing is enthusiasm," said Dan Ash, a representative from VIVA who was at the meeting. "There are a lot of students interested in community service, and they don't know where to go. [The rally] will be a good resource for them."

able than others. Speaking from her own experiences, Balfour found that her success comes from thinking revolution 24 hours a day.

"We must push and develop radical programs to improve public health for all women," Balfour said.

Another woman on the panel discussed how she became HIV–positive, and how her life has taken a turn from drug abuse and the sex industry towards that of community outreach and education. This woman found prostitution as a way to make ends meet.

"Prostitution, in this country, is intrinsically related to drug abuse," Balfour said. "This fact needs to be presented when we're studying to become physicians, nurses, and social workers. We must address the reality when developing social programs."

Nalina Narain, panel member and executive director of the Asian Task Force Against Domestic Violence in Boston, discussed the sad truth about violence against women. She noted that 3 to 4 million women are battered each year, and 54 percent of women will be battered at some point in their lives. Health care facilities need to address these issues by placing questions about domestic violence on their intake forms, as well as photographing the injuries that result, according to Narain.

"We need to create an environment intolerant to abuse," Narain said. "Until this is accomplished, the statistics will surely continue to rise."

She explained that the United States added to the sex trafficking when they constructed "dance halls" for their lonely G.I.s, during the height of the Vietnam war.

"In this respect, the sex trade and tourism became linked," Rosca said.

"One million to two million girls every year are chewed up by a globe of sex," Rosca said. "Trafficking of women is the third most profitable activity in the world. Drug trafficking is number one and guns is second.

"The sex trade is hooked up with international chains, and outwardly respectable enterprises, with ties in the Philippines, Thailand, Latin America, Africa, and Korea," Rosca said.

When trafficking takes place in many of these developing nations, girls as young as 11–15 are sold by the men in their family, father or brother, in exchange on average for $400. The girls then are brought over the border and continuously raped, according to Rosca.

"This is called the unveiling of the virgin," Rosca said.

As a result of the ongoing rape, AIDS is extremely prevalent in the high traffic countries, according to Rosca.

Rosca urged her audience to participate in the Second United Nation Conference on Women in Beijing, China in 1995.

Don't surrender your happiness

Every Christmas my father threatens to bring home an eel. He claims that eel is a traditional and tasty Italian holiday dish, but only if it is fresh. His annual plan involves purchasing a live eel in Boston's Chinatown on Christmas Eve and keeping it in the bathtub until he sacrifices it for our dinner that night.

My brother and I make gagging noises and my mom threatens to lock him out of the house if he ever actually follows through with his scheme. Not surprisingly, we have never had eel on Christmas Eve, though this season is still young.

Our family holiday celebrations and eel battles usually only involve my immediate family, because almost all of our relatives live in Canada, Italy, New Jersey and Vermont. We call or write to far-away family members to wish them happy holidays and catch up on how they are doing.

One of the people that is an important part of our holidays is my Great Aunt Margaret, who, at 81 years of age, calls every Thanksgiving and Christmas, and still sends birthday cards to us every year. Margaret and her husband Charlie hold a special place in my memory that is often reserved for loving grandparents in people's minds.

As we got older and Margaret and Charlie moved to New Jersey, phone calls made up most of our contact with them. Even in college I looked forward to hearing from Margaret when I came home for holidays.

Last year Margaret developed multiple myeloma, a neoplasmic bone disease which causes bones to soften and become deformed. She then began the first of what has now become 21 sessions of chemotherapy. In addition to the pain she suffers from the chemotherapy, Margaret has congested heart failure, which virtually debilitates all remaining physical strength.

Each time I pick up the phone receiver to chat I expect her voice to be a shadow of what it was the last time I talked to her, though time after time her high energy and unfailing charm prove me wrong.

This Thanksgiving Margaret called, right on schedule, and spoke to my mother for a while longer than her usual updating and well-wishing takes. I could tell by the look on my mom's face that whatever she was being told upset her. Before she handed me the phone, my mom told me that Charlie had developed severe Alzheimer's disease, and not only did not recognize his wife, but was acting violent toward her at times.

Charlie has been ill for many years, and if there is any truth the notion that women are stronger than men in old age, she is living proof of it. Margaret, who cannot walk around her own house without the aid of a walker, has been taking care of her husband since he became sick. She cooks for him, cleans the house as best as she can, and as of recently, appeases his disease-related habits like hiding his shaving gear and asking her to find it in the middle of the night so that he can shave.

I cannot imagine sharing a lifetime and creating a family with someone who will forget who I am and even physically threaten me during oblivious fits later in life. Nor can I imagine the pain of taking care of a loved one who is incapable of realizing or reciprocating this love.

But Margaret, whose own life is a struggle and whose marriage is now a chaotic attempt to support her husband, somehow maintains the outlook that life is full of small joys which must not be overlooked.

When I told her that I am wearing a dress that she bought for my mother while she was in college to a holiday party this year, she was thrilled. "You're giving me goose bumps, all up and down my arms," she said, as she laughed delightedly.

After I hung up the phone I marveled at how courageous and uplifting Margaret is. She reminds me that defeat is only a state of mind, and that the loser is the one who laments even the smallest upsets, or gives up hope easily, surrendering to lack of faith. If Margaret can catch even a glimpse of happiness somewhere in the midst of such unfortunate circumstances, we can all learn a lesson about being responsible for our own joy.

This Christmas while I argue why I will return to Amherst if my father brings the eel home, I will await Margaret's call and wish for her the same happiness and inspiration that she has already given me.

Keeping up with modern toothcare

Remember when polishing your tusks was short and simple? You stumbled into the bathroom, getting up for school, still crazy with sleep, squeezed an inch of paste out of the tube, half of which fell on the floor, and generally zapped your fangs for a minute or so with the other half and went out the rest of the day as nothing had happened.

It anything further was ever mentioned it was during some commercial on TV when a vacuous guy in a white lab coat would tell you the correct way to brush was from the gums up, but nobody ever took those jokers seriously.

Oh, and also sometimes some junk about bad breath.

Not anymore.

No, now it's a daily interdisciplinary battle involving orthodontics, preventive dentistry and comprehensive oral and gingival hygiene. Take my re-education for instance. It began innocently when I first heard from impeccable sources that the function of a toothpaste was not to clean teeth any longer but to contain an element called fluorine or derivatives thereof.

Armed with the giant scientific stride, I spent the next couple of happy years using a toothpaste which earnestly reminded me every morning that it was indeed inundated with a thoroughly reassuring dose of such a fluoride.

Imagine my consternation then, one day, when I came to know from equally impeccable sources that if my toothpaste was not fighting bacteria as its first cause of existence, that I might as well have been brushing my teeth all alone with kitty poop.

Horrified that my entire mouth was about to decay and fall off, I immediately rushed out to get a toothpaste which did the above needful thing and found, instead, that science had again left me behind in the dental equivalent of the Dark Ages.

For standing here that day among those rows and rows of toothpastes, I discovered that the one I had been using not only did nothing about something called plaque but apparently had no idea how to handle tartar either — two evil entities which I was informed my ivories verily teeming with.

Determined not to take any chances this time, I bought a double action antibiotic toothpaste which tripled as a mouthwash, gargle, and rinse and left my breath baby fresh with an original mixture of cinnamon and mint flavor and helped develop muscle tone on my gums and tongue.

Only to find out the next morning that the toothbrush I was using was a 1940's model. That was when manufacturers seriously believe that their brushes were only supposed to come in contact with teeth.

Weeping shamelessly, I went right back and bought one that had rounded bristles which were extra coned at the edges for a deep motor and canine penetration and simultaneous cheek massage.

The handle was ergonominically designed to mold into the fit of my palm and never made me bend my wrist more than an aerobically correct 30 degrees. Also, just in case, I forgot to replace my toothbrush every three months, and my jaws had to be amputated for gangrene the middle row of those polyunsaturated bristles were of a different color, guaranteed to change their hue on the first stroke of the 90th day.

You'd imagine that the two hours I spend each morning nowadays doing workouts in my mouth would finally satisfy those impeccable sources. But no. It has now come to light from researchers at the cutting edge of medical technology that in order to really prevent cavities which could destroy every part of my teeth from the enamel, dentine, cement and pulp to the nerve roots themselves, I should "slosh" around a liquid predentifice in my mouth before actually brushing. This would help dislodge purrefying food particles.

Then after brushing, of course (for people who can spare the whole morning, this is to also use it a few times during brushing) for absolutely the best results.

Not to mention denital floss.

And the final spray.

See what I mean?!

The pub just got Black Label on tap, replacing Heineken for a while. We were all very excited about this, as German beer just doesn't cut it sometimes. That was basically the exciting part of the night, as we ended up sitting around for a while talking about basketball and women. It was kind of boring, except for the moment that Jeff told us a story about how he stepped on a frog. Tuesday night, what the hell.

crazy dream again last night. I had come home and was hanging out with Cindy, happy to see each other and all that, and we were sitting in front of a big bay window and it was really warm out but started to snow, and I thought it was just the way the weather was back home. I turned to say something to her and she looked scared and started crying, and then ran through this curtain of beads and left me standing there. Then a dog came up to me and sat on its haunches and stared at me, and I kept kicking it until it ran away. Every time I dream about home it is a bad dream, it bothers me.

Things are okay around here as usual, but I am anxious to go traveling again, two weeks back at school and I am already bored. I had a dream about you last night, we were just hanging at your house looking at the snow fall in summer. It made me sad, and I wept rivers in my tea. ha ha.

I just scored a 67 on my biology exam, which is about an A- or so, I think. I finally studied for it , went to the library and everything. I've decided to try to do that for all my assignments now, as I was not happy with how things were going before. Life here is pretty good, although I guess I miss travelling, but you have to be happy with where you are. Still meeting a lot of people here, going out a little more on the weekends and it's a lot of fun but I'm trying not to spend too much. Cindy is okay I guess, though we don't communicate as much as before. The weather is becoming real nice now. I can ride my bike into town without a coat.

I tried to go to the library on the other day and just sat there watching people come and go in the lobby. I think I got around a B or so on my last exam, but that's only because it was sinfully easy. Well, hope your week is fun, mine shall be full of wonder and excitement I am sure.

The whole thing is so funny, cause she's got this crazy London accent too. just a crazy kid overall I suppose. man, I don't know, things are nuts. I'm drowning in classes, I'm drowning in trains, drowning in warm ales. Too many things, going round and round, but its good to be whirling instead of standing. I'm finding it hard to think of entirety sometimes, just a face and a routine. it makes me feel guilty, cause its like an obligation to keep in touch. lost in times, motion to dizzy laughter, and under trying moons it drains the feeling into emotion and loses its substance. goodbye, goodbye goodbye.

Letters to the Editor

Telescope project deserves recognition

To the editor:

Not only was the Nov. 30 story on our Large Millimeter Telescope project riddled with errors, it also advanced a foolish attitude toward a major cooperative science project between the University of Massachusetts and Mexico.

Although we note that the Dec. 1 Collegian corrected two errors (i.e. referring to the astronomy department as the "astrology department" and locating Mexico in the "southern hemisphere"), these corrections do not go nearly far enough in dispelling inaccuracies created by the story.

The faculty and staff of the Five College Radio Astronomy Observatory who have worked on this project for several years strenuously object to its characterization as the "predicted sight [sic] of future southern excursions, involving sun, fun, and astrology."

This $46 million project involves the construction of the world's largest radio telescope operating at millimeter wavelengths. Its immense power and sensitivity will permit astronomers to study dense clouds where planets form in the Milky Way and in distant external galaxies. The telescope will return this country to a leadership position in radio astronomical science which it has last in the past decade to Japan and Europe.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts has appropriated $4 million for the project. At a ceremony Nov. 17 at the State House in Boston, Lt. Governor Paul Cellucci characterized the LMT as a "scientific and educational breakthrough." The program will train Mexican and American students in state- of-the-art science and technology and is expected to create high technology jobs in Massachusetts.

It is unfortunate that the Collegian story entirely failed to convey the scientific and educational importance of this project for the University of Massachusetts and the citizens of the state.

Student demands changes in DCs

To the editor:

Is it just me? Why do I feel like I'm the only one who has a problem with it? Why is it so terrible when it should be much more acceptable?

The D.C. has been my worst enemy for the past year and a half. The food it terrible. Frequently, after eating at the D.C, I find myself in the bathroom as soon as I get back to the dorm. It's not just eating after dinner, either, it's every time I eat there. It's either eat at the D.C. or starve. I usually end up ordering out most nights even If I did eat at the D.C.

Tonight, I entered the Worcester D.C., had my card scanned, and waited patiently in line. Upon arriving at the point where I would be served, I gazed at my selections. I front of me I saw shrimp, noodles, and some weird looking sauce. I said to the server, "I would like to have the noodles and the shrimp but no sauce." The server looked at me, shook her head and rudely said, "You can't have shrimp if you don't take the sauce with it." After hearing this I shouted a few profanities and oped for the the buffalo chicken tenders, which were too spicy. I was in the D.C. for a grand total of ten minutes and left quite angrily.

I don't feel that it is fair that we must eat at the D.C for a minimum of two years especially when we don't get to choose what we want to eat. I think that if someone doesn't want "Vic's Secret Sauce" on their shrimp then they shouldn't be forced to eat it. I'm in college now, and I know what foods I like and dislike. If we are forced to eat at the D.C then efforts should be made to make it, If nothing else, a bearable experience. The food could be a lot fresher, a little warmer, a lot tastier, and we could be presented with a little more variety.

I hope that I'm not the only one on campus who is willing to speak out against the D.C. and I encourage anyone else to also speak out. I mean, it can't be just me. The more people that speak out for a change the more realistic the demands of change become.

Williams' latest gets Loose; Shellac's debut ambitious

LOOSE
Victoria Williams
Mammoth Records

Take country, pop, jazz and some very quirky lyrics and you've got a minimal description of Victoria Williams' sound.

Loose is all of these, but still becomes more than just the sum of its parts. Williams' voice has a certain roughness that is unique enough to grow on you. Mixed with lyrics about plants, hitchhikers and other various seemingly insignificant items, the music conjures up images of sitting in a rocking chair on your front porch on a late summer evening.

Trax On Trax Off

The first two tracks on the album, "Century Plant" and "You R Loved" are among the best on the album. A few times the album enters the realm of a three-ring circus, with Williams spouting fast stream of thought lyrics over sparse piano, but it is worth getting past to hear her rendition of Louis Armstrong's "What a Wonderful World."

"Nature's Way" is somewhat reminiscent of something by America (of "Been through the desert on a horse with no name" fame) and features guest vocals and guitar from Dave Pirner of Soul Asylum. Pirner also lends his talents on the track "My Ally."

Some other highlights include "Crazy Mary," "Sunshine Country" and "Waterfall." The album also features guest appearances by Peter Buck and Mike Mills of R.E.M. Definitely an album worth checking out. A- (Mike MacLean)

SAN FRANCISCO
American Music Club
Reprise Records

Mark Eitzel is a loser. Not the type of loser that lackadaisical alterna-schmoes such as Beck and Green Day make millions off of personifying, but rather the type of everyday nobody that usually walks around the streets of your town unnoticed.

For years now American Music Club's lead singer has been wallowing in a world all his own. A world where all relationships are inevitably doomed to fail, everyone is a liar and the only salvation comes at the bottom of a warm glass of beer.

While all this gratuitous self-pity may seem like a tiresome motif to try and spread over the course of six albums, American Music Club have been more of less hitting the mark successfully time and time again. Taking the practice of being down on ones luck and turning it into an art form, Eitzel and Co. have made a career out of what most spend a lifetime trying to avoid.

With San Francisco, the band's second effort for Reprise Records, the band once again dons its vagabond attire and takes us on another dark tour of the seedier side of city life. This time around, though, the band has abandoned much of the arty arrangements and sparse production of their previous effort, last year's often brilliant and underrated Mercury, opting instead for a more straight-forward approach.

While this less self-conscious style of music does move the band that much closer to the schmaltzy territory of Vegas crooners (something that the band has continuously flirted with in the past), all is still business as usual in the lyric department.

"Lost again, am I lost again," softly sings Eitzel on the album's downbeat opener "Fearless," setting the tone early for what is about to come. Accompanied by layered keyboards, delicately plucked strings and droning guitar, Eitzel spins his tales of love and loss throughout the course album. Often coming off less as a rock star and more like the guy sitting on a barstool next to you who had one too many.

Although much of the album sticks faithfully to the bands dour ballads, they do display their ear for poppy (if not jazzy) arrangements on songs such as "Can You Help Me?" and "How Many Six Packs Does It Take To Screw In A Light."

With San Francisco American Music Club have proven that they may just be one of today's best kept musical secrets. And while the album probably won't win them over any new fans or land them on heavy rotation MTV, self- depreciation never sounded so good. Beautiful losers indeed. A- (Matt Audette)

AT ACTION PARK
Shellac
Touch and Go Records

Steve Albini: shining example of artistic integrity amidst an increasingly corporate music industry or self-indulgent, pretentious, egomaniac?

This is a debate which has circulated around Albini since his days with the late-eighties noise phenomenon Big Black and only increased since the break-up of his subsequent, profoundly anti-P.C., Rapeman project. The charges against him have been fuelled by his infamous behavior both in and out of the studio.

In the past few years, the man responsible for producing albums by Nirvana, The Pixies, P.J. Harvey, and The Jesus Lizard (among others) has earned quite a reputation as a control freak occasionally resulting in openly bad blood between him and the bands he works with. Albini has also become notorious for publicly denouncing prominent rock icons at every available opportunity.

His bad reputation, combined with a relative creative drought recently, have prompted many fans and enemies alike to question just what Albini has to be so smug about. To those people, At Action Park should serve as a powerful reminder.

Shellac is unquestionably Albini's most ambitious endeavor to date. The band's success stems from the fact that it actually sounds like a band and not just a forum for Albini's guitar antics.

Bob Weston of the Volcano Suns and Todd Trainer of Brick Layer Cake form one of the tightest rhythm sections in recent memory.

Their precision timing blends perfectly with the clatter and scraper of Albini's trademark guitar sound to create aggressive yet complex anti-pop.

While Big Black suffered from being stuck in perpetual sonic overdrive, Shellac maintains a well-paced balance between methodical, lurching numbers like "The Idea Of North" and inducements to speeding tickets like the frantic "A Minute."

The band is at its sinister best on "Song Of The Minerals." Weston and Trainer steadily build up a mood of white- knuckle tension while Albini spouts characteristically self- abusive aphorisms in a voice about as sweet as black coffee.

To say that Shellac is far from easy listening is an understatement. Albini and company assemble and disassemble traditional song structure at will and even the occasional hints of melody are heavily tinged with dissonance.

While At Action Park may not leave you whistling a memorable tune, it is nevertheless a must for anyone interested in Albini's dark brand of musical ingenuity. A- (Matthew Justin Faerber)

Art Happenings showcase student art work & poetry

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

It is often said that spontaneity is best when thinking up creative concepts. In essence the second annual Art Happenings at the Wheeler Gallery grew from this mentality.

The main goal of Art Happenings is to create an open space for students to come in and display various art works. Any UMass student is invited to bring any three pieces of art work to the event and it will remain on display through Dec. 15.

It is an excellent opportunity for artists to showcase their work in a professional atmosphere. The event is also a great way to gain some exposure many artists don't have access to.

"People are welcome to just hang out, hang art and eat food. And also look at the art that is there," said Dianne Bilyak, spokesperson for the event.

According to Bilyak, the concept for Art Happenings was developed by Martha Hauston last year and was held in March. Over twenty students participated in what Bilyak describes as a "very successful" event. It was also one of the largest attended shows that the Wheeler Gallery has ever put on.

The original idea began in the 1950s with "Happenings," which were events where art was created spontaneously by the people who were in attendance.

The concept was based on the activity and not necessarily the finished product. People should come to the event with an open mind and a willingness to have fun.

"This year we hope for a good turn out as well, we're providing a free space and materials for hanging. We'll also be video taping, taking pictures, serving junk food and playing jazz music," said Bilyak.

In addition to the exhibit, there will be a poetry reading at Wheeler Dec. 6 at 7:30 p.m. Anyone who wishes to share their poetic musings with the public is welcome to recite their verse.

If there are any students interested, they should call Dianne Bilyak or Peter Manseau at 585-0172. Poets can also show up at 7 p.m. and sign up for the open slots. They must have at least 5 minutes of material. Poets are advised to get there early since there is only limited space available.

Art Happenings runs Dec. 6 - Dec. 15. The poetry reading will be Dec. 6 at 7:30 p.m. The Wheeler Gallery is located in the Central Residential Area. Gallery hours are Mon.-Thurs. and Sun. 2 - 5 p.m.

Player of the Game

Lou Roe, senior forward - 33 points, 10 rebounds.

Highlights...

Despite the 33-point, 10-rebound performance of forward Lou Roe, there was little to be excited about for Massachusetts...freshman Raef LaFrentz had 18 points and nine rebounds for the Jayhawks...sophomore point guard Jacque Vaughn shined for the second straight year scoring 14 points and dishing out 11 assists for Kansas.

The Minutemen return to action for their home opener Wednesday when they take on the Pittsburgh Panthers at 7:30 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Center. Massachusetts has not lost on campus since January 1993.

"I said, 'you have to play the best defense of your career in the next 1:14, but it'll just be the best defense you've ever played to date, because tomorrow, we're going to play better, and the next day we'll hopefully play better.

"I always felt that you could come close to your potential if you push yourself hard enough. And that's what we try to do."

There is no definite answer as to whether the ranking did effect either team in the match-up. What matters was who played better in the 40 minutes of the given day, and it was Kansas on Saturday.

"I don't think it had any effect at all because we weren't really worried about our No. 1 ranking," said Massachusetts' Lou Roe, who scored 33 points and pulled down 10 boards. "You know, we worked hard all the way up to this point, why [slack] off because to win."

eight the rest of the way.

The Minutemen also experienced difficulty in capitalizing on their opportunities at the foul line. Massachusetts was seemingly out-of-sync throughout the entire game.

Anxious Mike Williams played in his first game of the season, before fouling out with 1:14 left. With 1:49 left, the 6-foot 2-inch guard, who had eight points on the day, drained a three-pointer to cut the lead to within three. A possible clutch scenario from the known buzzer-beater was put to rest when Williams' fifth foul was called.

"I'm just trying to work him in," Calipari said. "I didn't think he played well the first half, but it was his first game and I told him that at halftime. I thought in the second half he did better."

Senior Lou Roe (shown here against Arkansas) was impressive again, but his teammates gave little help as the Minutemen fell to Kansas.

Hockey cannot follow Merrimack's lead in league

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

If one elects to measure success strictly through wins and losses, then the University of Massachusetts hockey team is as unsuccessful as can be.

After 11 games of the 1994-95 season, UMass has managed to tie only one opponent (Air Force) while dropping its remaining 10 contests.

And as attention to the men's basketball team reaches unparalleled heights, not only are observers straying away from the hockey contests themselves (2,551 on Friday night, 2,640 Saturday, nearly 4,000 fewer than at the BU game Nov. 18), in turn they lose sight of the inherent degree of difficulty in establishing a Division I program.

It took John Calipari four years to turn UMass into an NCAA caliber basketball team. Legendary UCLA Basketball Coach John Wooden was hired in 1948, but did not win his first of 10 NCAA titles until 1965.

UMass hockey has been back in operation for a mere 14 months, after lying dormant since the 1978-79 season. That is not a lot of time in which to recruit a roster with only two upperclassmen and ask it to play a full Hockey East schedule in only its second season.

"Rome wasn't built in a day, but I'll tell you right now, we're building it," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said.

Consider UMass' latest opponent, Merrimack, the last team to join the formidable conference, in 1989. The Warriors took their lumps in the inaugural campaign, posting just three conference victories.

But Merrimack's situation was very different from UMass'. No one pulled the plug on its program, then suddenly asked it to revive itself on such an accelerated pace. Ron Anderson's club had a full head of steam upon entering HE, coming off a string of success in Division II and an appearance in the 1988 Division I tournament quarterfinal, the first by an independent.

Merrimack was the top ranked independent team from 1987-89, when it compiled an astounding ECAC record of 66-4 and won three consecutive ECAC titles.

In the 1990 Hockey East Tournament, the Warriors pushed Boston College, a team with three future NHL players (Greg Brown, Marty McInnis, Steve Heinze) to the brink of elimination before expiring in the third game of the best-of-three series.

So how long did it take Anderson and Co. to get it done? Anderson was hired in 1983, and Merrimack only went 13- 19 that year, though it advanced all the way to the Division II finals, demonstrating once more that less heralded clubs often peak as the season's end draws near (UMass take note).

"[UMass] is probably a better hockey team that the scores indicate," Anderson said. "There's no question in my mind that they have right now a better hockey team than we had our first year in the league."

"They're a better team than we ever were our first couple of years, and I think their going to win more than their share of games."

Besides being the two most recent additions to Hockey East, UMass and Merrimack share another trait in that they are both founded on goaltending. The Minutemen are the only team in HE to have used three different goalies this season, each of whom has proven he can give the team a chance to win, which Mallen views as a goalie's chief responsibility.

Merrimack's Martin Legault, only a sophomore, was outstanding in each game this weekend and is the undisputed cornerstone of the program. The Gloucester, Ontario (Canada) native remains undrafted, but by his senior season will likely be considered an NHL prospect. Anderson said last Thursday that Legault had put practiced all week due to an injury.

PAUL BUCCIARELLI / COLLEGIAN

Once again, on Saturday night, it was Merrimack opening up a 2-0 first period lead. Chris Silvestro scored on a power- play at 14:02, blasting a shot by UMass goaltender Rich Morrarty (21 saves), who was starting for just the second time this season. Rob Beck converted a two-on-one with Casey Kesserling at 19:22.

"We have to start our games in the beginning, coming to play for all 60 minutes," Mangananro said. "We need to get going in the first period of games."

Chris Fawcett tallied for UMass at 12:42 of the second period, the second goal of the season for the freshman. The story the rest of the way was Legault. The sophomore netminder was the first star of the game, after being named the second star of the previous game.

Kesserling added the insurance goal at 6:12 of the third, as UMass could get no closer.

"We need to learn how to play in one goal games, we will start to tie these games and then break through and win a few," Mallen said.

"We have a lot of respect for the UMass hockey team, this team will be a good one soon," Anderson said.

One-timers: UMass forwards Rob Bonneau, Mike Evans and Gerry Cahill were eligible for Saturday's contest. The threesome had to sit out for a fighting incident in the game against Boston University on Nov. 19.

Brian Corcoran saw his first action of the year, playing forward in Friday's game. Corcoran has joined the team after completing the season as a defensive end for the UMass football team, in which he was named Yankee Conference Defensive Player of the Year.

Pats improve playoff chances with win

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO— Ricky Reynolds raced 11 yards with an interception for a touchdown, carrying New England closer to the playoffs and stumping on New York's hopes as the Patriots beat the Jets 24-13 Sunday.

Tortured by turnovers this season against the Jets, the Patriots finally capitalized on one of their own. A fake field goal that turned into a punt pinned the Jets at their 1-yard line. After Richie Anderson ran twice for 4 yards, Boomer Esiason threw toward Ivan Yarborough on the left side. Reynolds cut in front, caught the ball and cruised the rest of the way for the Patriots' first defensive touchdown of the year and New York's first turnover of the game.

On the previous possession, the Patriots had a fourth-and-7 at the New York 31. Punter Pat O'Neill, who also tries long field goals, lined up for a field goal. Instead, he placed a punt perfectly, and tackle Todd Rucci downed the ball at the one. Art Monk tied Steve Largent's NFL record of 177 straight games with at least one catch on a 7-yard completion from Esiason with 3:25 left in the first quarter.

The game was tied 10-10 at halftime, and all the Jets' points came after turnovers. Esiason's 15-yard scoring pass to Monk followed a fumble by Leroy Thompson that was recovered by Alfred Oglesby. Nick Lowery's 46-yard field goal four seconds before intermission was set up by James Hasty's interception against Drew Bledsoe.

In a 24-17 win over the Patriots on Oct. 16, Brad Baxter ran for two first-half touchdowns after New England turnovers.

The Patriots finished the scoring Sunday on a 2-yard run by Thompson, who replaced Marion Buts in the starting lineup and ran for a season-high 80 yards.

Monk provided one bright spot for the Jets. He also made a costly mistake.

The Jets appeared to go ahead 16-10 when Anderson ran 29 yards into the end zone early in the third quarter. But Monk was penalized for blocking Reynolds in the back at the Patriots' 5, moving the ball back to the 15. Six plays later, the Jets settled for Lowery's 26-yard field goal and a 13-10 lead.

The Patriots kept the ball for 20 minutes, 43 seconds in the first half. They also outgained the Jets 213 yards to 79, and they took leads of 3-0 on Matt Bahr's 33-yard field goal and 10-7 on Bledsoe's 16-yard pass to Vincent Brisby.

Bowe pounds Donald before fight and inside the ring

By Tim Dohlberg
Associated Press

LAS VEGAS — Larry Donald should have waited another day to sue Riddick Bowe for assault and battery. Judging from the look of his face after Saturday night's fight, he might have had an easier case to win.

Donald emerged bruised and swollen after Bowe alternately chased and battered him for 12 rounds in a lopsided contest to win for the first time since losing his heavyweight titles to Evander Holyfield 13 months ago.

Another fight almost erupted in the postfight press conference after Donald's camp attempted to serve Bowe papers from a lawsuit filed Friday in Los Angeles charging him with assault and battery for hitting Donald at a pre-fight news conference.

Las Vegas police had to intervene and hustle Bowe out the door after a dozen or so members of each camp began squaring off after Bowe refused the papers.

"I want to apologize to Larry and I don't want the kids out there that look up to Riddick Bowe to do things like that," Bowe said after taking the unanimous decision at Caesars Palace. "It was wrong."

Donald, who didn't fight back when hit at the news conference, had much the same reaction when he met Bowe in the ring.

Donald fought in the style of his hero, Muhammad Ali, but didn't throw nearly enough punches nor land any hard ones in a fight he seemed more happy to survive than win.

"I just wanted to take my time with Larry and Larry is the type of guy that you won't look good against if you're constantly chasing him," Bowe said. "I think I got him winded and it took a lot out of him."

The former champion, who marked Donald's face and nearly put him down in the final round, won all 12 rounds on one ringside scorecard in handing the 1992 Olympian his first defeat in 17 professional fights.

"Riddick Bowe was a better fighter tonight, but I'll be back," Donald said. "This will make me a better fighter."

Judge Dalby Shirley gave all the rounds to Bowe, scoring the fight 120-108, while Judge Bill Graham had it 118-110 and judge Art Lurie 118-109. The Associated Press had Bowe ahead 118-111. "I needed a fight," said Bowe, whose only fight since losing the titles to Evander Holyfield in November 1993 was an aborted four-round no contest against Buster Mathis Jr.

Donald, though, turned the night into more of a track meet than a boxing match. He bounced on the balls of his feet almost the entire fight, throwing punches only in short flurries before either moving out of range again or tying Bowe up on the inside.

"Come on, come on," Bowe implored Donald throughout the fight. Donald's habit of fighting in spurts showed in ringside punching statistics, which had Donald throwing only 233 punches for the 12 rounds to 473 for Bowe. The stats showed Bowe landing 219 punches to 103 for Donald.

"I know I won pretty easy," Bowe said. "I can't do any better. I trained hard for this fight and so did Donald." Bowe, who raised his record to 35-1, took a big step toward becoming a factor again in a heavyweight division now ruled by George Foreman and Oliver McCall.

Bowe's manager, Rock Newman, said Bowe would fight Herbie Hide in the spring for the lightly regarded WBO version of the title in an attempt to further fracture the heavyweight picture.

Kansas knocks Massachusetts from No. 1

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

ANAHEIM, Calif. — Some days, the shot does not fall.

The No. 1 University of Massachusetts men's basketball team had one of those days on Saturday as it fell to No. 7 Kansas, 81–75, in the inaugural John Wooden Classic at the Pond in front of a sold out crowd of 18,300 and an NBC nationally-televised audience. The Minutemen shot 39 percent from the field (30–77) and dropped below 50 percent from the free throw line (10–21, 48 percent).

Kansas	81
Massachusetts	75

This coming after the 104–80 blow-out against defending champion Arkansas on Nov. 25, where the 39 percent was closer to 50 (48 percent) and 40 of 50 foul shots were drained.

With the loss comes an almost certain drop in the Associated Press poll for Massachusetts, as a new No. 1 will likely be named today. The Minutemen, who were the top–ranked team for the first time in school history this past week, failed to convert against the relentless Jayhawk defense.

"I think we got beat by a better basketball team," Massachusetts Coach John Calipari said, "on Dec. 3, just like we were the better team last week against Arkansas. I think they played with unbelievable intensity the whole game.

"I think we got out–played, we got out–hustled, I thought we got out–coached. We got beat just about every way possible today against a fine basketball team."

"We're ecstatic. We played well, particularly in the second half," Kansas Coach Roy Williams said. "We do realize it's just one game."

Even the shoulders of Lou Roe, who continued his early– season explosion by scoring 33 points and pulling down 10 rebounds, couldn't carry the load for Massachusetts. As strong as Roe was, the Minutemen were knocked around in the paint, mainly by Raef LaFrentz (18 points, nine rebounds) and Greg Ostertag, whose numbers of nine points and five rebounds before fouling out may not be impressive, but his six blocks were. Scot Pollard also contributed to the Jayhawk frontcourt onslaught with 12 points.

Whether it was outstanding game–plan execution by the Jayhawks, or a lack of hustle on the part of the Minuteman defense, back–door screens pulverized Massachusetts.

"I thought they played smart inside, and we got beat on the back screen at least 15 times," Calipari said. "I told the guys it's something that we work on one way, and they played it the way we worked on it."

Marcus Camby, who sat out last season's Preseason NIT Championship loss to Kansas (86–75) with an injured knee, was held by Ostertag and Co. to just two points and five rebounds in 28 minutes.

The team effort was there for the patient and composed Jayhawks, as the guard play flourished. Jacque Vaughn scored 14 points and totaled a game–high 10 assists, while back–court mate Jerod Haase hit for 16 points and pulled down eight boards.

After Roe hit a five–foot turn–around jumper with 1:05 left to cut the Kansas lead the three, 75–72, and a Massachusetts timeout was called, Haase knocked down a trey from behind the NBA three–point stripe with 30 seconds to play to make it 78–72, taking the wind out of the Minutemen's sails.

The first half saw Massachusetts take a 22–17 lead with 10:30 left in the half on an Edgar Padilla baseline jumper just inside the three–point line. The Jayhawks then went on a 14–4 run, culminating by a Haase free throw that put them up by five, 31–26.

Coach John Calipari and his No. 1 Minutemen were knocked off in the Wooden Classic against Kansas last Saturday.

The score see–sawed during the last three–plus minutes of the half. With a minute left, Roe hit a layup, giving him 20 for the half in as many minutes, along with providing the Minutemen with a one–point lead at halftime, 39–38.

As for the second half, Massachusetts owned its last lead of the contest with a little over 19 minutes left, as Roe banged a jumper to make it 41–40. From then on in, it was all Kansas, as the lead hit as much as eight, 66–58.

The Minutemen did not give up, as Kellogg nailed a three– pointer to close it to within five, 66–61, with 7:26 to go in the game. The momentum, however, failed to head in Massachusetts' direction as the Kansas lead fluxuated from three to

Upset sends Minutemen back to the drawing board

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

ANAHEIM, Calif. — As fast as the Massachusetts Minutemen became the kings of the mountain in college hoops last week, another team was ready to knock them off.

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team bowed 81–75 to Kansas on Saturday in the inaugural John Wooden Classic at the Pond, in Anaheim, Calif. With the loss, the Minutemen (1–1) will likely take a step back in the polls, and some other team will sit atop the college basketball world.

With an impressive 104–80 dismantling of then–No. 1 Arkansas on Nov. 25, then–No. 3 Massachusetts leapfrogged No. 2 North Carolina to the top spot with just one victory in a three–day period. Now, with the loss to the Jayhawks (2– 0), the Minutemen should learn today that they will likely drop a slot or two in the Associated Press poll, thus giving the NCAA its third No. 1 team in as many weeks.

Welcome to the crazed world of college basketball.

A world where you can be the top team in America for a day, and wake up the next one as one of the others. A world where every team wants to be No. 1, and every team wants to knock the top dog off. Massachusetts was king for a week with its first–ever No. 1 ranking, and Kansas took the Kansas systematic (and gutsy) approach to break the Minutemen down.

"Oh, absolutely, I do," said Massachusetts coach John Calipari when asked if the top–ranking which his team had earned had an effect on the way the Jayhawks played. "But, you know what, they're so well–coached, they would have come to play even if we were 200th."

Did the ranking affect the way Massachusetts played?

"I think we were ready, that's what's amazing," Calipari said. "I just think they were more ready than we were. I mean, we were ready to play. Last night, I checked the rooms at 10 p.m., and our guys were in bed sleeping. They got up this morning for breakfast, and they were very much alert. The warm–up, the stretching — we were very good. And to start the game, we weren't too bad."

"I just think that in the end, they wanted that game a little bit more than we did. And they found whatever it's called, deep down in, they reached down and grabbed something that we didn't have today. If that means the No. 1 ranking did that to us, maybe it did, I don't know. But I do know they wanted that game a bit more than we did."

Talk about a coach who gets his players to rise to the occasion against the best. In his seven—year era at Kansas, Roy Williams' teams have played four No. 1s, and have beaten three of them, including Massachusetts.

During the contest, Williams took his players aside when Minuteman Mike Williams fouled out with 1:14 left in the game, and gave them his usual advice.

Merrimack keeps UM hockey winless

By Anthony Guido
Collegian Staff

A hot goaltender can make all the difference in the world, and Martin Legault proved that this weekend in leading Merrimack College to a two–game sweep of the University of Massachusetts at the Mullins Center.

Merrimack	4
Massachusetts	3

Legault saved 37 shots in Friday night's 4–3 Merrimack victory, while stopping 40 UMass shots on Saturday night, a 3–1 Warrior victory.

"Legault was unbelievable, he has to get much of the credit," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "We dominated the game [Saturday night] but he held up."

The Minutemen [0–10–1], still searching for that first victory of the season, fell to 0–7 in their first year in Hockey East. Merrimack [4–8–2, 3–4–2 in HE] has strung together three consecutive wins.

"I'm frustrated a bit, I thought at this point we'd have a few wins by now," Mallen said. "But, we are getting there, winning games at the end of the season is more important than right now."

Merrimack was UMass' first opponent when the program was reborn last season, with the Minutemen dropping 8–2 (at Merrimack) and 4–1 (at Amherst) decisions to the Warriors.

"We are making progress, when you compare it to last season's games with them. Using that as a measuring stick, we are getting closer," Mallen said.

"Joe Mallen should be pretty pleased, his team played well both nights. They deserved better than two losses," Merrimack Coach Ron Anderson said.

On Friday night, the Warriors jumped out quickly on UMass goaltender Dave Kilduff (43 saves). Matt Adams got Merrimack on the board at 2:26 of the first, a power play with UMass' Brad Norton in the penalty box for hooking. Tom Johnson made it 2–0 at 14:25 of the first.

Blair Wagar scored only 1:50 into the second period to cut the deficit in half. Warren Norris found Wagar with a feed across the crease past a fallen Legault.

A problem that has plagued the Minutemen is yielding a goal just after netting one. The Warriors struck right back at the four minute mark as Martin Laroche scored another power–play goal. Tiger Holland had been sent off for hitting after the whistle.

"It's a mental thing, we need to keep our concentration at all times, never letting up," Mallen said.

Merrimack would get its third power–play goal of the night on four chances at 19:28 when Adams netted his second goal of the game. The tally helped garner Adams the first star of the game designation and put the Warriors up 4– 1.

UMass was to fall short on a spirited third period rally. Sal Manganaro was at the head of that charge, deflecting a Norton slapshot for his first goal of the year past Legault at 7:26. The goal was on the power–play, only UMass' fourth in 64 chances.

Merrimack	3
Massachusetts	1

Manganaro then set up Norris fourth goal of the season at 15:34, cutting the lead down to one. At 17:16 Norton was sent off for hooking, but the Minutemen still had chances to tie.

Mallen called for a timeout with 14 seconds remaining, setting up a play. Jaynen Rissling's shot was hit by a crowd in front of Legault. Off the rebound Tom Sheehan's blast was deflected just wide by the Merrimack netminder.

Minutewomen lose two more

By Brian Perillo

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team was defeated twice this weekend at the MCI/First American Classic in Nashville, Tenn.

Vanderbilt	98
Massachusetts	54

UMass fell to No. 9 Vanderbilt, 98–54, in the opener on Friday night, before dropping to Wake Forest, 67–55, in the consolation game on Saturday.

The Minutewomen saw their record drop to 0–4 on the young season.

Against host Vanderbilt, UMass had some problems from the outset. The Minutewomen watched the Commodores go on a 17–0 run to turn an early six–point lead into a 28–5 cushion.

Vanderbilt, which raised its record to 5–2 with the victory, led 50–22 at the half.

The Minutewomen were already in foul trouble, as junior center Melissa Gurile had picked up three, and sophomore forward Crystal Carroll had four before the intermission.

Freshman Tez Kraft, playing in only her third game for UMass, led the way for the Minutewomen with 12 points.

Gurile tallied nine points, while junior forward Octavia Thomas' 11 rebounds led UMass, and tied Vanderbilt's Mara Cunningham for the game high.

For Vanderbilt, guard Michelle Palmisano had a game– high 17 points, including five three pointers, to lead six Commodores in double figures.

On Saturday night, UMass battled Wake Forest in the consolation game. The Demon Deacons had fallen to Tennessee State in Friday night's action, but were able to rebound and down the Minutewomen, 67–55.

Wake Forest	67
Massachusetts	55

UMass played Wake Forest close, and when Gurile hit a jump shot with just under three minutes remaining, the Minutewomen had pulled within two, 57–55. But the Demon Deacons responded, going on a 10–0 run behind Raeanna Mulholland, who scored five of the game's final ten points, including a three pointer, and Wake Forest was able to pull away and grab the victory.

For Massachusetts, Thomas led the way with 17 points, while Gurile poured in 16, grabbed a team high nine rebounds and had five blocked shots.

Thomas, who scored 24 points in the two tournament games, was named to the MCI/First American Classic All– Tournament team.

The junior also moved into the No. 10 spot on the UMass career scoring list, passing Karen Damminger.

Gurile also took a step up in the record books, as her five blocks give her a total of 94, moving her past Keyburn McCusker into second place on UMass' career blocked shot list.

In the tournament's final game, Vanderbilt pummelled Tennessee State, 84–40, to take the tournament title.

The Minutewomen will be in action again next Saturday when they travel to Michigan to take on the University of Detroit.

Volleyball ends season quietly at NIVC

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team wrapped up their season this weekend as the Minutewomen went 1–3 at the National Invitational Volleyball Championships in Kansas City, MO.

The Minutewomen, making their first ever appearance in the NIVC, and their first post–season appearance since 1980, fell to Fresno State Friday morning before rebounding to defeat Idaho State in the afternoon.

On Saturday, UMass, who finished the season at 27–8, was downed by Arkansas, before winding up the tournament with a loss to Iowa State.

Fresno State defeats UMass 15–3, 15–2, 15–10

In their first game of the NIVC tournament, UMass came out sluggish against the Bulldogs, and quickly found themselves behind two games to zero.

The Minutewomen trailed 13–3 in game three before mounting their only real offense of the match, scoring seven straight points to cut the Fresno St. lead to 13–10. The Bulldogs [19–12] were able to hang on, however, and send UMass to an 0–1 tournament mark.

The Minutewomen were led by sophomore outside hitter Dionne Nash, and freshman Lesley Nolan. Both recorded 11 kills to lead the squad.

UMass defeats Idaho State 15–8, 18–16, 15–3

The Minutewomen fared much better in this one, as they downed the Bengals [18–10] in three straight. The Minutewomen won game one with ease, then had to battle back from a 9–1 deficit in game two.

Idaho State also led that one 14–7, before UMass scored seven straight to tie it up at 14.

The Bengals took the next point, but UMass stepped up, and scored four of the next five points to win the game.

Game two seemed to take the wind out of the Bengals' sails, as they went down meekly to the Minutewomen in game three 15–3.

UMass rode on the shoulders of Nolan in this one. The outside hitter led the team in kills [nine], digs [12], and service aces [four].

Nash and sophomore outside hitter Giza Rivera each collected eight kills for the Minutewomen, while freshman Michelle Paciorek picked up five on the way to a .429 hitting percentage.

Arkansas defeats UMass 15–6, 15–10, 7–15, 18–16

On day two of the NIVC, the Minutewomen ran into the Lady Razorbacks. After falling in game one, UMass jumped out to a 7–0 lead in game two, before Arkansas [18–17] battled back to take 15 of the next 18 points and ice the game.

The Minutewomen were able to grab game three, but were edged in a battle for game four.

Rivera, another member of the A–10's first team, had 17 kills for the Minutewomen, to go along with eight digs. Nash had 16 kills and seven digs, while junior setter Cass Anderson led the way with nine digs and 49 assists.

Iowa State defeats UMass 9–15, 15–7, 15–11, 15–9

In their final game of the season, the Minutewomen tangled with the Cyclones, who are ranked No. 11 in the Mideast region.

UMass was able to take game one, but then lost the next three to fall to 1–3 on the weekend.

Nash once again stepped it up for the Minutewomen. She tied a career high with 20 kills and only two errors, en route to a .462 hitting percentage. She also tallied 15 digs.

Rivera led the club with 18 digs, and also collected 19 kills, the 19th time this season the sophomore reached double figures in both categories.

Chancellor creates new task force for Greek area

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

The "Animal House" stereotype was just one of the topics discussed last night at Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity house, as University of Massachusetts Chancellor David K. Scott, administrators, faculty, staff and students gathered at an open forum regarding Greek Area–University relations.

Scott was joined by Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Thomas Robinson in a discussion which provided students an opportunity to ask questions or raise concerns about the University and the Greek Area.

Leaders of the Greek area were also in attendance at the forum sponsored by Sigma Phi Epsilon, which drew an audience of approximately 150 people.

Shortly after dinner, mediator of the forum and president of Sigma Phi Epsilon Jake Orville introduced Scott and Robinson, who immediately opened the forum to questions.

The discussion, which covered a wide range of areas affecting UMass students, resulted in a proposal by Robinson for a task force, to be chaired by the Northeast President of Panhellenic Council Amy Schulman.

The task force will study the challenges that face the Greek Area, and need to be met in order to be successful, according to Schulman.

"We are going to pursue a task force to help provide input on where the Greek Area is going to go in the future," Schulman said.

Robinson offered his help with the task force after Scott declined, citing that he would be too busy to attend any more meetings. According to Schulman, that is not good enough for the Greek Area.

"The Chancellor said that he would never have the time to be on the task force," Schulman said. "I understand that not everything can be a priority, but when enough people who show their concern, and there were more than 100 here tonight, interest must be taken."

The proposed task force was the result of an hour–long discussion centering around how the Greek Area is viewed by the University.

Scott set a tone for the forum early in the evening as he spoke about the decline in interest that has occurred at UMass, even though the Greek Area has not faced many of the problems that other universities have endured.

"Interest in the Greek community has waxed and waned in the last years," Scott said. "But I haven't heard any bad stories. I know many other schools have trouble with hazing, racial and drinking problems, but not here."

Joking with Scott, Robinson said that UMass has had its problems but that he "just hasn't heard about them."

Robinson went on to say that Greek life has been given a bad reputation due to the stereotyping of fraternities such as in the movie "Animal House."

"A lot of people think that everyday Greek life is just like that, but "Animal House" is not typical," Robinson said. "Maybe at schools like Michigan State, but not UMass."

JESSICA TAVERNA / COLLEGIAN

Chancellor David K. Scott (middle) and Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Thomas Robinson (right) spoke to administrators, faculty, staff and students in an open forum at Sigma Phi Epsilon last night. The forum, regarding Greek Area–University relations was mediated by Sigma Phi Epsilon President Jake Orville.

Scott and Robinson said they feel that the Greek Area does many positive things with their philanthropies, community service, and the Newman Center, and is undeserving of the bad reputation.

"The fact is that the Greek Area is involved in the community, and it is part of the UMass story," Scott said. "But, the University is constantly being beaten up by all the bad things that happen, not the positive."

"I am proud of the Greek system on campus," Robinson said. "We ought to be proud of whatever group or community you belong to."

Discussion on building safety is continued

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

University administrators met with students and faculty Friday morning to address recently raised concerns about the safety of New Africa House.

On hand to discuss the state of the building were Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Thomas Robinson (who called the meeting), Deputy Chancellor Marcellette Williams, Associate Chancellor Frederick Tillis, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Paul Page, and Associate Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Bill Rose.

Environmental Health and Safety Director Donald Robinson was also in attendance, accompanied by two state building inspectors, one of whom specialized in fire safety.

The question regarding when action might be taken to renovate New Africa House became a larger issue last week when the Black Student Union included the refurbishment of the former dormitory in its list of demands to Chancellor David K. Scott, who did not attend Friday's meeting.

Over the course of the meeting, EH&S Director Robinson attempted to calm worries over the major safety hazards believed by some to exist in New Africa House.

The building was inspected in September of this year, as it is annually, Robinson said; yet, he also noted that state law only requires inspection every five years.

Regarding the presence of potentially dangerous lead paint beneath latex paint on fourth floor walls, a press statement issued on Sunday read that of 25 chips taken from an office thought to contain lead, none was found after "extensive testing."

Also, Robinson said that state regulations on lead paint only apply to daycare and residential areas; although New Africa House does not fall under those specifications, he did say that the damaged rooms would have their leaking roofs repaired and chipping walls repainted.

However, asbestos is still present in small quantities in two rooms, the Augusta Savage Gallery and the Mechanical Room, located on the first and basement levels, respectively.

Robinson said that asbestos has been removed at a steady rate from the building over the past few years.

Receipts and estimates dating back to 1987 were presented at the meeting, indicating that thousands of dollars have been spent by the University not only on ridding New Africa House of asbestos, but also on new tiles for the men's room and remodeling the stairwells.

Yet, the door to the mechanical room, to which Black Student Union Vice–President Dan Lizana gained access in order to point out asbestos samples, should never have been unlocked; according to Robinson, access to the facility should only regularly be available to Physical Plant employees.

Other considerations brought up by University officials included reviewing the needs of a physically disabled student who uses the handicapped–inaccessible New Africa House daily, taping down potentially dangerous carpet edges, replacing a broken water fountain on the second floor, and increasing ventilation to the art studio.

A campus help telephone was installed in the building on Sunday.

Student–athletes extend caring hand to children

SPRINGFIELD — While for some there was a language barrier to overcome, no communication gap could get in the way of what the night was meant to capture in the first place — compassion, caring and genuine love.

Last Thursday, 20 student–athletes from the University of Massachusetts visited the Shriners Hospital for Crippled Children in Springfield. The trip was arranged by the Student Athlete Advisory Committee, which is headed by president Kyri Sparks.

"Originally I was concerned because here we are as athletes, the epitome of fitness, and we were going to see kids, some of which can't walk or just had surgery," Sparks, who is also a member of the field hockey team, said. "But I think they were appreciative to spend some time with some new faces. I think we brought some life into that playroom."

The scene in the playroom was indeed a special sight, as for two hours that life generated smiles, laughs and fun activity. While many of the patients in the hospital spoke Spanish or Greek, the language gap was hardly noticeable.

"I didn't really notice it at first. A few people came in and started speaking Spanish," Kerry Aker of the track and field team said. "At first it made me wonder where they came from, and why they were in the hospital in Springfield. I thought it was interesting trying to understand them. It was a great experience."

The athletes handed out different types of gifts, from hats to posters. Almost every team donated a gift. But more than any materialistic gift given out, nothing was more special than the quality time spent with the children.

In one corner of the playroom the student–athletes played pool with a child who could play only from her hospital bed. Other student–athletes painted water colors, played cards and watched television with the children, as photos were continuously snapped by some of the children's parents who were visiting the hospital as well.

"It was a lot of fun. The kids were great," said Joel Pittman of the men's soccer team. "They were cool to talk to. And it was nice to hang. It was like childhood all over again."

The Student Athlete Advisory Committee (SAAC) formed about a year and a half ago, when a few students experimented with the idea in an independent study, Sparks said.

Many universities around the country have an organization as such, although it is not required by the NCAA.

UMass has modeled its program around the many programs that had previously existed.

"It helps to foster a sense of community within the student–athletes on campus," Sparks said. "It gives people a chance to meet people from other teams on campus and make friends with other athletes, so it enhances their circle of friends."

Last year, the organization held a successful blood drive in conjunction with the Red Cross, and plans to hold the drive again this year.

"We're trying to schedule events which include every member of the student–athlete population," Sparks said. "To give everyone the opportunity to get involved is difficult because student–athletes are so busy . . . This group gives us a way in which we can organize a body of 700 people."

Many of the student–athletes that attended the Shriners Hospital were left with a lasting impression.

"What struck me the most was to realize how significant our health is," Lianne Laing of the women's gymnastics team said. "We're athletes and are capable of doing certain things. And little do we know, in a hospital 30 minutes away, there are kids who can't walk or have no limbs. I felt good inside my heart that I had done something I wouldn't have normally done on a weeknight."

"Even though we were over there for only a couple of hours, I felt like I made friends," Aker said. "I felt like we made a difference. I also felt sad because I wanted those kids to be able to be outside running in the snow and doing other activities."

Dining commons worker tests positive for tuberculosis

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts dining common worker tested positive for tuberculosis, according to University officials.

The unidentified worker from Berkshire Dining Commons was tested about a month ago for tuberculosis and has not been at work since it was suspected the individual may have been infected.

University spokesman Danny Chun said the individual will not return to work until the treatment is complete.

After two to four weeks on medication, an individual is no longer contagious. Medication is generally administered for up to nine months.

Once officials suspected the worker may be infected with tuberculosis, there was an investigation of other dining common workers who may have come into close contact with the individual to determine if any other individuals may require testing for the disease.

Chun said no other workers were determined to be potentially infected nor did any other worker test positive for tuberculosis.

Tuberculosis is caused by bacteria which mainly effects the lungs. Bacteria are transmitted through the inhalation of infected droplets of moisture — primarily through coughing or sneezing.

Tuberculosis is particularly prominent among individuals living in crowded, poorly–ventilated conditions.

Chun said students should not be alarmed that the food of the dining common was infected by the worker because he said the risk of the worker spreading the disease is minimal.

"It is not food–borne. It is transmitted through the air."

"It is not food–borne," Chun said. "It is transmitted through the air."

All in–coming students are required to show proof they have had a tuberculosis test and all employees are tested for the disease before they are hired, according to Chun.

The worker was tested before being hired and tested negative for tuberculosis, Chun said.

UMass students perform holiday mountain rescue

Hurt woman saved when hikers get aid on mountain trail

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

Four University of Massachusetts students assisted in the mountain rescue of a injured woman over Thanksgiving vacation.

Evanglen Gerstenberg, a 55–year–old sixth grade teacher from Long Island, N.Y., was hiking down the Appalachian Trail from Upper Goose Pond in Beckett Nov. 25 when she slipped on the trail, hit her leg against a tree dislocating her ankle and breaking it in three places.

Her husband, Robert Gersteberg, a 54–year–old vocal teacher at Sachem High School in New York, was unsure whether to go for help or to stay with his injured wife, and was close to panic when four UMass students, going for a late day hike, responded to his calls for help.

Brian Conz, a freshman geology major, Kevin L'Italian, a sophomore environmental science major, Siobhan O'Toole, a sophomore education and Spanish major, and Lisa Vercauteren, a sophomore Spanish major, were hiking and heard Mr Gerstenberg and came to his aid.

"We heard this guy screaming for help," said Vercauteren.

Once they were appraised of the situation, Conz and L'Italian said they decided to hike back down the trail and get help, leaving Vercauteren and O'Toole with the Gerstenbergs.

Conz said he and L'Italian hiked back down the trail and drove to a tavern located in nearby Lee to call 911.

The rescue team carried Mrs. Gerstenberg down the mountain on a sled, according to Conz.

It took an hour and a half between the time the four students found the couple and the medical crew arrived, Conz said.

"It wasn't really that chaotic," said Vercauteren, "We just wanted to calm the guy down. He was almost in tears."

Mrs. Gerstenberg said she required surgery as well as nine screws and a plate to repair her broken ankle.

"She was in so much pain," said O'Toole, "We tried to keep them talking."

According to Vercauteren, Mrs. Gerstenberg spoke of her medical insurance and picking up their two daughters while her husband tried to get her to relax and concentrate on staying conscious.

While waiting for the rescue team to arrive, O'Toole said Mrs. Gerstenberg compared the pain of her injuries to the birth of her second child.

"We are experienced hikers, my husband and I," said Mrs. Gerstenberg. "We knew we shouldn't be hiking in sneakers, but we just wanted to get out for a while."

Mrs. Gerstenberg said she hopes to return to work soon in a wheelchair.

"It was a strange situation," said O'Toole, "I felt like we should be on Rescue 911."

Clinton's trip brings ups and downs

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

BUDAPEST, Hungary — President Clinton urged European leaders Monday to confront "forces of despair and hatred" with new peacekeeping units and an updated security strategy in Bosnia. Looking to the future, Clinton added, "As we strive to end the war in Bosnia we must work to prevent future Bosnias."

"Ethnic hatred threatens peace and tolerance . . . Change everywhere is causing fear and insecurity," he said, speaking during a fast-paced seven-hour stop in this picturesque Central European capital.

One positive result of the visit was a ceremony that put the 1991 Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty in force with its schedule for scuttling 9,000 U.S. and former Soviet nuclear warheads by the turn of the century.

Ending 12 years of hard bargaining and tedious legislative action in Washington, Moscow and, finally last month in Ukraine, the president declared, "Free nations can and will create a safer globe than did the divided world of yesterday."

However, the nuclear scale-down and Clinton's message to the 52-nation Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe were muffled by a rebuke from Russian President Boris Yeltsin and sharp words of despair from Bosnian President Alija Izetbegovic. Referring to U.S. plans to expand NATO eastward, Yeltsin said the United States and its West European allies were moving to set up "new zones of demarcation." As a result, he said, the drive to draw East and West together after the Cold War could "sink into oblivion."

"Why sow the seeds of distrust?" he asked. "After all, we are no longer enemies. We are all partners."

Even as a senior U.S. official was dismissing Yeltsin's complaint as "alarmist," Izetbegovic was heaping scorn on the West and Russia for not rescuing his country from Serb rebels in a war that has taken some 200,000 lives and left many hundreds of thousands homeless.

Referring to the encircled Muslim enclave of Bihac, under merciless Serb artillery assault, a stony-faced Izetbegovic said, "Nothing is being undertaken, and indeed it is proclaimed that nothing could be undertaken. The whole international community, embodied in the United Nations and the mighty NATO pact, cannot save one endangered city."

Clinton lent his support to upgrading the peacekeeping functions of the CSCE.

But Izetbegovic suggested a peace plan being promoted by the United States, Britain, France, Germany and Russia, was a prescription of tranquilizers to a patient suffering a serious illness. He vowed that the Bosnian government army of 150,000 soldiers would fight on to the end.

Backing him up, Croatian President FranJo Tudjman warned that his government might eschew a political solution and "use means that are within the prerogative of every sovereign state" — an apparent threat to expand the war.

Clinton, speaking earlier, had credited the Muslim-led government with accepting the peace plan, which calls for the country's ethnic division, and had urged advancing Serbs to agree to a cease-fire and to negotiations based on the plan.

The Serbs are resisting. They hold 70 percent of Bosnia, and even the lure of potential political ties to Serbia has not won over Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadzic. On Sunday, Secretary of State Warren Christopher said a round of shuttle diplomacy by American diplomat Charles E. Redman proved "useful but not decisive."

American, British, French, Russian and German diplomats, working as the "contact group," will go to the Balkans later in the week. But Izetbegovic's condemnation of the international community's failure to protect U.N.-designated "safe areas" may foretell poorly for settlement of the war raging some 300 miles from here.

In yesterday's Collegian, the description of GATT was incorrect. The acronym stands for General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

GATT is a multi-lateral trade agreement negotiation which began in 1947. The GATT agreement was signed by 116 nations to promote free trade and lower tariffs around the world.

GATT fails to address the issue of sex trafficking of women, according to Ninotchka Rosca.

Bentsen plans to resign from cabinet in January

By Martin Crutsinger
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Treasury Secretary Lloyd Bentsen is planning to resign early next year to return to Texas, administration officials said Monday. The Cabinet departure would cost President Clinton one of his most respected policy-makers.

Robert Rubin, who has headed the president's National Economic Council for two years, is widely believed to be in line for Bentsen's job.

The administration officials, who all spoke on condition that their names not be used, said that Bentsen has long wanted to return to Texas and believed that now was a good time given that Congress has finally passed the world trade agreement, the last unfinished economic business from Clinton's first two years in office.

These officials said that while Bentsen and Clinton have discussed Bentsen's desire to leave the Cabinet, no formal resignation letter has been submitted yet and the exact timing was still up in the air.

Speaking on Monday at the National Press Club, Bentsen sought to make light of the resignation rumors although he did not deny them. "Paraphrasing Mark Twain, the news is premature. I will let you know," he promised the room full of journalists. "You will be among the first to know when it is news."

Rumors of Bentsen's imminent departure have swirled around Washington ever since he purchased a townhouse in Houston earlier this year for more than $1 million.

When he does leave the Cabinet, Bentsen, 73, said he doesn't plan to retire. "I think you rust out before you wear out," he said.

Associates expect Bentsen, who made millions of dollars in insurance before he beat George Bush for a U.S. Senate seat in 1970, will become active in business again, possibly with his son. The administration has so far floated only one name as a possible successor to Bentsen — Rubin, a multimillionaire who resigned as chairman of Goldman, Sachs & Co., the giant Wall Street investment firm, to become head of Clinton's National Economic Council.

Rubin, 57, who spent nearly three decades at Goldman Sachs, is well regarded on Wall Street and has also won praise for his ability to coordinate economic policy inside the administration. "Rubin's selection as Treasury secretary wouldn't cause any problems. Wall Street would be getting one of its own," said Bruce Steinberg, an economist at Merrill Lynch in New York. "Rubin would be the obvious choice either for Treasury secretary or Federal Reserve chairman."

But some analysts expressed concerns that the administration was losing a respected go-between with Congress in Bentsen at a critical time when the administration will have to deal with a Republican-controlled House and Senate.

Open house shows benefits of 2 in 20 Floor

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

The 2 in 20 floor for Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender Students and Their Heterosexual Allies at the University of Massachusetts is opening its doors tonight to invite people to learn more about the floor, and its members.

Located on the fourth floor of Mary Lyon Residence Hall in the Northeast Residential Area, the Special Interest Residential Program (SIRP) has been in effect since the fall of 1992, said Michael Burchell, residential director for the Crabtree cluster, which the 2 in 20 Floor is a part of.

Anne Marie Peavey, the resident assistant on the floor, said the community is very important for the students that move in.

"The 2 in 20 floor is a safe place for GLB folks to live without question," said Peavey. "It's a community in which we can support each other, and live free of harassment."

Peavey said the open house is to show gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and heterosexual allies what the floor offers and to fix any rumors.

"It's to show what the floor is really like, and dispel any myths," said Peavey. "For most people coming to the University, this is the first time you're out in your life, and we want to show you that you can live with people who actively support you."

John Erin Mayor, a second semester resident on the floor, said the community is more designed for those who are already "out of the closet."

"You do have to be fairly out to live on the floor," said Mayor. "For better or for worse, closeted is not particularly tolerated on the floor."

Brian Lepper, a first semester resident on the 2 in 20 Floor said this was one of his concerns when moving on the floor.

"I didn't know what to expect," said Lepper. "It turned out to be a lot of friends that are out, not one big orgy of everyone."

Lepper said another concern of his before joining the floor was rooming with someone who might want a relationship.

"The idea of rooming with someone your dating or getting roomed with someone that is attracted to you bothered me," said Lepper. "But that doesn't really happen."

Peavey said there are very few roommates that have a relationship.

"People here have that option, but that's not what people come here for," Peavey said. "I could live with my girlfriend anywhere on campus."

Mayor said the residents of the floor have to be careful they remember why they are there.

"If you ignore the meaning of the floor, then it will disappear like others," Mayor said. "SIRPs fail when people just live there and don't pay attention to it. People must remember it is a Special Interest Residential Program, and not just any dorm."

Peavey said she thinks the floor is going in the right direction.

"I think it's quite the opposite because we started out with such few people, and it's more than doubled," said Peavey. "We spend a lot more time trying to make people feel more comfortable."

She said the floor not only provides a safe living environment, but they have activities for the residents.

"Every semester we have a drag ball in Mary Lyon," said Peavey. "We have a lot of regular programs, open to students, and sometimes we have speakers."

Tonight's third annual open house will include a tour of the 2 in 20 floor, and will run from 7 p.m. to 8:30 p.m.

UMass crew club is making an attempt to row for world record

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

In an effort to set the world record for the longest continuous indoor row, the University of Massachusetts men's crew club is rowing 24 hours a day in the campus center.

The team is rowing on an erg machine right outside the Coffee Shop in the campus center. Each participant is taking five one-hour shifts. About 62 club members started rowing at noon last Thursday and will continue to row until noon Dec. 15 to break the current 12-day record, said David Touhey, a junior sports management major and president of the club.

The current record of 12 days is held by the Vancouver Boat Club in Canada. If successful, the club will beat the other record by two days.

"If we are going to break a world record we might as well break it by a lot," said Head Coach Stew Stokes.

The record will officially be broken at 12:01 p.m., Dec. 13 by Stokes, who is also a coxswain, the person who steers the boat, for the U.S. National Team. The new record will be set Dec. 15 at noon when, after two straight weeks, the wheel will stop spinning.

"It's a once in a lifetime thing, to set a world record," said Touhey.

As of noon yesterday, the ergometer had registered a distance long enough to get from Boston to Ashland, Ohio.

"It's going real nice," said Joe Platt, a senior psychology major, after rowing for 46 minutes.

The club is not only trying to break the world record, but also to raise some funds for the crew. As a club, they get minimal funding from the school. Each crew member is required to pay at least $200 in dues, said Touhey.

To train on the water in a warmer climate during spring break, each member is required to pay an additional $250, said Platt.

The UMass crew club is the oldest sport at UMass, restarted in 1965. The club was disbanded after defeating Harvard in the late 1870s when the school was still Massachusetts Agricultural College, according to Touhey.

Opinion/Editorial

Campus decay must end

The decaying condition of the buildings on the campus is not something new, despite the amount of coverage it has received in local papers in recent weeks. Anyone who has attended a class in any building on campus knows just how bad things are.

The New Africa House is the worst example of the decay of campus buildings. The hazardous conditions present a danger for those who use the building daily, yet the administration seems to shrug it off with the unsaid statement "It's not that bad."

Students of this campus have reached a level of apathy to the point that they no longer even care about their own safety in the classroom. The administration pours more money into new buildings and new administrative positions, but trash isn't even removed from the New Africa House.

The administration will not listen and will not make changes unless the students of this campus put the pressure on. Have your parents call the Chancellor's office, write your own letter, or drop by his office.

As students who pay large amounts of money to this university for a quality education, we deserve more than hazardous working conditions and buildings on the verge of being condemned.

The time for inaction has ended. The administration owes us more.

Gays rights a back–burner issue

Republicans and Democrats have reached consensus on one issue gay rights should cause the least interest. The next congress will be about as irreligious as Ronald Reagan.

Gays have been shut out of politics since the day Bill Clinton was inaugurated. During his 1992 campaign, Clinton briefly mentioned the rights of gays, becoming the only openly pro–gay presidential nominee of a major party in a long, long time. Clinton received extra support in Hollywood, all other states like Massachusetts and New York, and he appealed to not gay communities.

The door slammed shut after less than a week of the Clinton administration. The presidential campaign of gays in the military pledged, and stopped town on the 1993 March on Washington.

Clinton said he's ignored the press about's Don Kathleen Anderson Cotton, Devan Patrick and Eleanor Johnson, to step out of a gay rights fight in Congress. The pastor officials wanted to challenge the constitutionality of the anti–gay laws on city Council who called this "love, peace, hope and simple.

Now Clinton has stepped in his budding homophobia from the new Congress. Except for a terse, year–old statement calling for "tolerance" of gays, Newt Gingrich and his gang have maintained their bigotry. Next, Newt will call for GOP "tolerance" of Blacks and Jews, no doubt.

The room is thick. The new Capitol Hill bureaucracy is composed of ex–football players, third–tier actors, pedophiliac 50–year–olds and Soviets. Bono. It is led by a Speaker who forced his wife to sign divorce papers while she lay in a hospital bed with cancer, because she wasn't pretty enough to be the spouse of a future President. Folks like Jesse Helms, Bob Packwood, Strom Thurmond and Bob Dornan fill the rafters. Their central tenet? Of course Conservatism.

Gingrich and Company is the Christian Right turn to Leninism and Machiavelli, for inspiration in governance. Yet the thorn remains. The Christian Coalition and other wackos are slightly tolerated were once the most pro–gay Western faith.

During the Middle Ages, history would have been turned around by the church building. Based on cash and prospects, and not on love, the Church did not consider them marriages to be fully born. Yet homosexual marriages, with no credit on the line were considered to be based on love alone. These unions were held inside the church.

It was not until centuries later when, seeking a scapegoat, gays were branded as sinners. This is basic marketing. To have a profitable religion, you need followers. To get followers, you need something for them to fear. To create fear, you create outsiders. It is the same explanation given by demagogues and would–be politicians since history began.

Today's "Christian" politicians would do well to study the history of their own faith in medieval Europe. Jews and gays are not the only ones who get their homo– and bisexuality is as Christian as bread and wine. Modern theologians consider some of the "Christian" values as gay or bisexual.

But I don't expect to see Pat Robertson cuddling as a pride march gay float. Gingrich and Livingston like the coaching staff and Pennsylvania are founded on hatred. Hatred, repression, cowardice, money and votes. It is a replica of why the Church persecuted figures to begin with. As long as there is Leninism, there will be a black vote, so does Christian fascism.

After all, if there is one thing the religious radicals are known for, it is their ability to divide people. Gays are the next group to fall victim to the religious right's attempt to create a "Christian" nation.

Questioning the wisdom of school prayer

The subject of school prayer is a touchy one in American society. On the one hand, many people support the notion of school prayer, believing that it will help fix the moral decline seen so pervasive in the United States.

Which explains why Republican Representative Jay Dickey, Democrat, who teaches "Psychology of Religion" said, "I think a lot of people feel that students in this state is flat, heading downhill. They see there's a lack of a moral center." He also said that public turn to prayer by rather, and that then there is might help.

The ruling of school prayer has the potential to be as divisive and dangerous as a ruling that it will be unifying and uplifting. With millions of religious groups in this country, there comes a problem of people feeling the prayer being done in the schools conflicts with their beliefs.

The Supreme Court first ruled that school prayer was illegal in 1962, when they ruled in Engel v. Vitale that a non–denominational voluntary school prayer in New York was found to conflict with the First Amendment. Justice Hugo Black at the time wrote that "prayer of students were given the option to leave the room or remain silent during prayer, the government would still be unconstitutionally fostering an "indirect coercive effect upon religious minorities."

In President Clinton's response to Rep. Newt Gingrich's demand for school prayer, he said, "I have always thought that the question was 'When does voluntary prayer really become coercive to people who have different religious views from those who are in the majority in any particular classroom?'"

This becomes one of the two central points in the fight over school prayer with the other being the separation of church and state.

Surveys on the matter varies greatly depending on the circumstances of the prayer. A strong majority of people, almost 70 percent, support student–led prayer. However, if the school administration, which is seen as an extension of the government, is responsible for choosing the prayer, the people supporting the measure is cut almost in half.

There is a complex reason for this lack of support. The same people who want the prayer also believe in the separation of church and state. They don't want to see this amendment, and through it the entire Constitution, be ignored, so they come to the conclusion. For this reason, people want a constitutional amendment allowing school prayer so they are not seen as invalidating it.

However, if this passes, the other issue comes into question. There are millions of people in the country with many different religions. While it is true that a prayer could probably be found that would be acceptable to the majority of Christians, Christianity and Islam, it is safe to say that acceptance of a non–theistic religion would not be as successful, much less someone who is atheist.

The first response to this problem is to let those students who leave the room suggesting any adverse affect on them. This wouldn't work, however. Young people are acutely impressionable and very aware of their peers, especially during junior high years. These students would be stigmatized if they left their class to leave the room, making themselves different from their peers every day. To avoid this embarrassment, most students would rather sit through a prayer that would be offensive to them.

So where does a solution lie?

Perhaps the best choice is a one–minute moment of silence. This would allow students the individual opportunity to pray if they wish, without stigmatizing them.

Jewish faculty speak out on Martin

To the editor:

As a university we believe in the importance of free speech and the exchange of ideas. We also believe that as a university we have an obligation to address the problems of our time and to take a stand for academic integrity for the dignity of all people and for diversity and social justice.

Professor Tony Martin of Wellesley College is coming to speak on our campus. His speaking tours is a matter of deep concern to the university community. Martin's views are supported by the academic committees at Wellesley College for using anti–Semitic tropes in his college teaching that are not only inaccurate but comprise unfounded accusations against Jews. As Diana Chapman Walsh, president of Wellesley College, has written: Martin's work "has fostered divisiveness ... rancor, and the view that scholarly objectivity or commonly–held arguments to advocacy–driven distortion and deceit." In other speech that must be countered, however stirring the temptation not to dignify it with a response."

Although Martin will speak on our campus, his activities have consequences at every one of the Jewish communities in and around Amherst. We are working to establish an environment that values the contributions of all cultures and peoples. In the past this university has come together in order to confront attacks on any cultural group in our campus community.

This attack on the Jewish communities should be another opportunity for the campus community to again come together to affirm our values of respect for diversity, social justice and multiculturalism.

We emphatically reject the politics of scapegoating that Martin practices. We should not remain silent in the face of his, or any attempts to polarize our campus communities and single out any segment of our community for scorn, misrepresentation and unfounded accusations. Academic freedom must be accompanied by academic responsibility. Martin has unfortunately demonstrated disregard for the canons of academic scholarship.

Chancellor's policy is misleading

To the editor:

In Wednesday's Collegian Chronicle, Chancellor David K. Scott wrote that the statement on freedom of speech, which was drafted by the campus Speakers Policy Work Group, is a "document we can turn to for guidance and direction in troubled times of turmoil that will govern conduct in such a time in a week or so with the visit of professor Tony Martin to our campus." The Chancellor's views on this issue, however were little more than a dismal drumbeat of lies, innuendo, stereotypes and the 101 other things that he claims to oppose.

First, the lies. The Chancellor claims that the Speakers Policy Work Group was convened by him this past summer because he wanted to affirm free speech. In actuality, the Work Group was formed only in mid–October and met on three successive Wednesdays in November.

On Martin's visit, the Chancellor asserts that he finds "many of professor Martin's views particularly his overarching of all Jewish people through references to specific examples and incidents, to be counter–productive ... in a climate stoked on overcoming, not perpetuating, stereotypes diminished all of Martin's research and scholarly writings.

To portray a seemingly more open–minded stance, the Chancellor issues a terrible and poorly thought out reason for why "students should allow the expression of opinions that we abhor." By claiming that "the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the marketplace of ideas."

The Chancellor says that he does not believe that the Black community is "bent on causing pain to the Jewish community" but rather that the invitation comes from "groups who have suffered ... an extraordinary history of pain ... in this country."

Once again, he has competently dismissed the variety of reasons that may exist for inviting Martin to campus. Overlooking his stature as a leading scholar and intellectual. Furthermore, the Chancellor has portrayed the Black community as a "group" that is reacting to its oppression by inflicting "pain" on other communities.

It has taken many months for the Chancellor to affirm what the vast majority of people on this campus already believed — that a firm commitment to free speech and intellectual discourse forms the fundamental basis of all University education.

The inconsistence of his administration appears to be long, flip–flopping and bureaucratic double–talk. One is only left to wonder who Chancellor Scott is trying to please.

MIM responds to letter

To the editor:

On Nov. 29, the Collegian printed an attack by the Turkish Anti–Defamation League on the Kurdish people and on the credibility of the Maoist Internationalist Movement. MIM? The TADL letter was in response to a MIM article, "Forced Arms Bans Kurdish Villages."

MIM did not arbitrarily accuse the Turkish state of burning villages in Turkish–occupied Kurdistan. Members of the Turkish government — including Turkey's Minister for Human Rights, Azimet Kovlicoglu, and MP Cindoruk — have openly admitted that the army is burning villages and called for investigations (Intercontinental Press, 11/4/94). Kurds in no small way same logic rights as other citizens of Turkey. There is a ban on the Kurdish language. Kurds are regularly imprisoned for owning cassettes of Kurdish pop music (Alan Warrens, "Turkey's Kurds after the Gulf War," 1993). The Turkish police have seized copies of the nationalist newspaper Ozgur Ulke (Free Country) and banned the paper (Ozgur Gundem Free Agenda/ International Press Service, 10/20/94).

The L.A. Times reported on Sunday that "three coordinated explosions ripped through separate offices of Turkey's leading pro–Kurdish daily on early Saturday, killing one person and injuring 22. The biggest blast occurred at Ozgur Ulke's main offices in Instanbul. Scores of Ozgur Ulke employees have been jailed for supporting the Kurdish rebels, and 10 reporters have been killed. Human rights organizations accuse the security forces of involvement in their murders; the government denies their accusations" (L.A. Times 12/4/94).

The policies of the Turkish state are even too harsh for their imperialist friends. The United States has encouraged Turkey to ease its ban on the Kurdish language (Associated Press 10/22/94). The revolutionaries fighting in Turkish– occupied Kurdistan do not need to impress the people's support. A Kurdish man interviewed in 1993 said of the Kurdistan Workers Party, "Everyone supports the PKK. This is a people's movement, and no one would turn against it." Throughout this century the Kurds have struggled against those states which militarily occupy Kurdistan (armies and suppress Kurdish culture. During the Gulf War the Iraqi Kurdistan Front went on a military offensive which liberated up to 95 percent of Iraqi–occupied Kurdistan. The United States half–heartedly supported the struggle of the Kurds in Iraq, while ignoring the increased repression of Kurds in Turkey.

And, for the record, there was a Kurdish state in the early 1900s. It was located in present–day Iraq and Iran. Ninja Marcus, 1993

Maoist International Movement

Public display was unnecessary

To the editor:

I try to keep an open mind and understand the views of other people but when people portray pornography and tell me it is a safe–sex demonstration, it makes me wonder what our world is coming to. In addition, no one is willing to take responsibility.

Even though the production in the Campus Center concourse was put on by about five members of the LGBA, ironically the LGBA says they had nothing to do with it. I wonder why they said that. Could it be that they are embarrassed by the whole thing? I would like to explain what I observed walking through the concourse on my way to class.

A large crowd gathered at the scene where masking tape marked off a large square in the center of the floor. The square was just big enough so that passers by were forced to watch this nasty scene. One of the girls had her tongue and hand on another girl's breast, making licking and sucking motions while her other hand fondled the girl's buttocks. Then the two slid on the floor while one proceeded to place plastic wrap on the other girl's vagina and put her face in it. The girl started licking while the other started moaning and groaning, giving the appearance of orgasm. Finally the girl stopped and the crowd of 30 or more students cheered and the two men in front of me gave each other high fives, cheering "I love UMass!" The only scene was all I could bear. One of the girls put on a rubber glove and started rubbing the crotch of the other girl and pressed her fingers in while they both moaned.

I am fully aware that they had their clothes on, but what were they trying to promote? Frankly, I felt violated and even embarrassed for the people who performed the scene. I only want to perform such explicit scenes, and that is your right, don't do it in people's faces where they are forced to watch, that is our right. Now time to set up an information table and not pornography!

De La Soul dies after disappointing Pearl Street show

By Stacy Gueorgueseva
Collegian Correspondent

DE LA SOUL
Pearl Street
Dec. 2

Hip hop veterans Posdnuos, Trugoy and Maseo of De La Soul returned to Pearl Street on Friday night to perform for an anxious and sizable audience. Clad in sweatshirts, sagging khakis and Timberland boots, the three members of the mostly defunct Native Tongue family entered the stage refreshingly on time but delivered a somewhat redundant and short performance.

De La opened up the show with the classic, "Potholes in My Lawn" from their debut album Three Feet High and Rising. The group performed two more songs from their debut album, and then concentrated mostly on tracks off their third and latest release, last year's Buhloone Mindstate. The concert also included their most famous track, "Me, Myself and I." Surprisingly, the crowd consisted mostly of generic "lollapalozuians," and the overall feel was not that of a bona fide hip hop concert.

Trugoy and Pos reciprocated the crowd's enthusiasm throughout the show periodically pausing to say, "What's up, Northampton!" However, instead of demonstrating more of their trademark humor and buoyancy, De La Soul disappointed concert–goers by using old techniques to keep the audience entertained.

For example, half and hour into the show, Posdnuos and Trugoy divided the crowd in half for their usual which–side–of–the–audience–has–the–true–hip–hop–fans "contest." Each side was asked to sing along with an old school rap song, courtesy of Maseo (and his newly acquired afro), the winner being the one with the most knowledge; unfortunately neither side demonstrated particular expertise.

"We've been doing this for — how long? Seven years?" remarked Trugoy, nearing the end of the performance, and proceeded to practice a bit of freestyle for the audience. The group then invited members of the audience to join them on stage and show off their freestyle skills with Maseo picking a beat. Among the six or seven freestylers, only two were women and one unquestionably did the most impressive rap.

De La Soul closed the show with "Ring, Ring, Ring (Ha Ha Hey)," a track off De La Soul is Dead. The crowd reacted wildly after the lights went off and De La departed leaving the house vainly chanting for an encore. The concert ended at precisely 11 p.m. leaving the crowd unsatisfied. In closing, De La proved once again that ever since the passing of their daisy–promoting, "Me, Myself and I" days, the threesome has sadly lost their focus. B–

Freedy Johnston to overcome 'Bad Reputation'

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

Freedy Johnston is a storyteller. Every since his 1990 debut The Trouble Tree, Johnston has quietly been writing delicate pop songs which chronicle the small heartbreaks and characters that are lost in the shuffle of life.

Johnston will bring his collection of songs and stories to the Pearl Street stage tonight, in a show which promises to be one of the area's finest this fall.

Born and raised in the small town of Kinsley, Kan. Johnston began playing guitar at age 16 and by his first semester in college was writing his own songs. Eventually Johnston moved to New York City where one of his demos found its way to Bar None Records and a record deal.

Since the release of The Trouble Tree, Johnston has continued to write songs which focus on the smaller facets of life. While Johnston claims that his songs are not autobiographical, it is hard to believe that his rural, small town upbringing hasn't played a role in his songs' motifs.

His 1992 sophomore release, Can You Fly, (which he financed by selling the family farm which was inherited from his grandfather) found him receiving heaps of critical praise and landing opening spots for the likes of Soul Asylum, Matthew Sweet and The Lemonheads.

Johnston is currently on tour for his latest release, This Perfect World, which also marks his major label debut. The album is produced by alternative producer du jour Butch Vig, who is responsible for the kick behind such bands as Nirvana and Smashing Pumpkins, and is the most professional and mature sounding piece of work Johnston has done yet.

Listening to the album is akin to taking a tour of the dark side of the American dream. The wide array of down–and– out characters that Johnston creates throughout the album seem so vivid they often seem as though they could just be the people next door.

"I wouldn't say I'm a morbid person, but I have to admit that I usually don't write happy songs," says Johnston. "To me, sad songs just seem to say so much more."

Already the first single "Bad Reputation" has become a staple on MTV's "Alternative Nation" and is beginning to slowly but surely make a dent in the pop charts as well.

COURTESY FRANK OCKENFELS III

Freedy Johnston will play the Pearl Street stage tonight.

With a strong buzz already circling around Johnston, it seems that it won't be long until he gets the recognition as a serious singer/songwriter that he deserves.

"I want to make something I can stand by," says Johnston. "When I'm gone, I want to know that I got it right."

So far he is well on his way.

The Schramms will open the show with their brand of rootsy folk–pop. The band is led by Dave Schramm, who has played with such bands as Yo La Tengo and currently have an album out on Bar None Records.

Freedy Johnston will be playing Pearl Street in Northampton tonight at 8 p.m. Tickets are $8/Adv. and $10/ at the door. The show is 18+.

Gift ideas for your favorite tech–nerd

Shopping for a videophile this holiday season? According to the December edition of Video Magazine, there are a number of unique, offbeat gifts available for under $100, most of which can even fit in a large stocking.

For those who always have the camcorder running, JVC has introduced the world's first two–hour (EP Mode) VHS–C and S–VHS–C cassettes. The strengthened tapes, which can be used in all C–type camcorders, cost $12 to $15 respectively.

Longer tapes for the camcorder won't be much help if the batteries run out, so Sima Productions Corp. introduced the Power Max PowerPocket ($49.95). This generous–sized family packed stores three charged 6–volt batteries, which provide direct power to the camcorder. The PowerPocket switches from one cell to another without tape interruption.

RCA's Remote Control Signal Sender ($59) is the perfect gift for anyone that desires the pleasure of a home entertainment system in every room. A set of cone–shaped units convert infrared signals to radio waves, then back again. This allows commands from a conventional infrared remote control to pass through walls, so a system can be operated from another room.

Ever tell your resident video game fan it is time for bed, only to hear the nightly response, "as soon as this game is over." Well, Naki International's Gamesaver ($50) may provide the answer. The battery powered cartridge lets Super Nintendo players save their game at any spot for up to 30 hours. If finding a worthy video–game opponent is your child's problem, then get him NBAND. It's a modem and video game network service that allows players to challenge each other from as far as three states away.

Japanese as a second language

Festival showcases speech contests, Kimonos and Kendo

"The key to learning a foreign language is to overcome the fear of speaking it," said Mr. Ohta, a native from Tokyo, who was one of the judges for the first ever Japanese Speech Contest.

The event called "JAC Fest," sponsored by the Japan America Club, was held on Dec. 5 in the Campus Center.

The subject material for the speeches was chosen by the Japanese language students participating. For the most part the speeches were about the interaction of Japanese and American culture. One competitor even made a Japanese speech about Rhode Island.

"Most other universities with a Japanese department hold speech contests. The Japanese department at UMass is overlooked by other universities and by business people, not like the private universities. In Japan, when you say you're from New England they think MIT and Harvard, although UMass has a lot of academic connections in Japan," said senior Michael Perkins, an economics major who studied in the Japanese department.

The Japan America Club is 20-years-old. "Our mission is to introduce Japanese culture to the UMass campus," said Tomoo Ohyama, a senior hotel, restaurant and travel administration major who is the first Japanese president.

JAC Fest included other cultural activities. There were exhibition tables displaying the art of Japanese calligraphy and Origami, the art of folding paper.

A thirty-year veteran Kimono artist, from New York City, illustrated a couple of variations on how to tie the sashes on Kimonos — the Japanese formal attire for women.

A presentation of the traditional Japanese sport called Kendo was performed by two men. Kendo is widely used in Japan as part of physical education in schools along with Judo. The simulated fight included the use of swords because, according to the JAC Fest pamphlet, "In Japan, swords have been held in great esteem since ancient times."

"They know Japan because there's Toyota, they know Japan because of Sony, but they don't know about the culture of Japan," said Ohyama.

The winners of the speech contest received gift certificates for Panda East, Taipei & Tokyo Restaurant, and Rao's Coffee Roasting Co.

RSO educates students about hunger issues at a free banquet

STEVE PEKALA / COLLEGIAN

Individuals get a taste of what world hunger is about during a banquet convened by MASSPIRG yesterday.

By Michelle Lugo
Collegian Staff

"One in ten people sought food relief in 1993 in the United States of America Sub-Saharan Africa is the world's primary food shortage region. Forty-thousand children die everyday from hunger related causes. Thirty-three million people live in poverty and suffer from hunger," according to literature from MASSPIRG, obtained from OXFAM.

A "Hunger Banquet" was served yesterday in Earth Foods. The International Students Association assisted MASSPIRG with funds, and the kitchen at Earth Foods was used to cook and serve the food.

Shelly Monstur, a sophomore family and consumer economics major, said the purpose of the "the hunger banquet is to make people aware that the hunger problem is due to unequal distribution of food in the world."

Monstur initiated the activity by briefly describing the purpose of the Hunger Banquet.

The whole theme of the night was how food is unequally distributed throughout the world. When it was time to eat, individuals from MASSPIRG did something unexpected. They made everyone who was there to dine for free, choose a piece of paper from a tin and depending on the color of the paper they either represented lower class, middle class or higher class.

The higher class people had the food served directly to their tables. The middle class and the lower class had to get up and go over to the Earth Foods counter to get served. The lower class was served the least amount of food in comparison to the middle class, while the middle class was served less food in comparison to the higher class.

Before the food was served, two guest speakers spoke about both the social and political implications of hunger. Nelson Acosta, director of the Office of Third World Affairs, shared personal stories of hunger he suffered as a child from a poor but humble family. "I remember seeing my grandmother crying because we had nothing to eat," said Acosta.

"We have all experienced hunger pains, but sooner or later we had something to eat. There are people in this world who suffer from hunger all their life," said Acosta.

"It must be a cruel way to die because you didn't get enough to eat," he said. "I'm not being dramatic. This is what is going on out there."

Another guest speaker was professor in resource economics, Julie A. Caswell. According to Caswell, there is enough food to feed the world but hunger is due to unequal distribution. People who do not have the resources are often malnourished and their children grow up with afflictions.

"However, there is evidence that since World War II this has become better," said Caswell.

Mirna Torres, junior political science major, heads the hunger and homelessness division of MASSPIRG, and has worked with members of that group in similar projects with the international, non-profit organization OXFAM. This charity organization has been working to alleviate hunger for over twenty years.

On Nov. 17 there was another event in conjunction with OXFAM and MASSPIRG in which students in the meal plan had the option to donate their meal to the organization through food services. According to Torres close to 739 students gave up their dinner at the dining commons that day.

An exclusive organization for Puerto Ricans emerges

■ Newly formed RSO will address issues not covered by Latino groups

By Michelle Lugo
Collegian Staff

The preamble for Boriquas Unidos reads: "[the organization] will not overlook or disregard the issues affecting us as native and mainland Puerto Ricans, as often happens under the broader agenda of 'Latinos.'"

A "working group" of eight Puerto Rican students completed a constitution and registration packet to become a new Registered Student Organization at the University of Massachusetts.

The founders had discussed the idea of having a group that will focus specifically on the culture as well as problems of the Puerto Rican community.

"We have to address our issues before we address issues in the Latino community in general," said junior William Davila. "A lot of times we try to adjust to everybody's issues when there is a discrepancy between the Latino communities. Statistics demonstrate that Mexicans and Cubans are advancing while Puerto Ricans are still in the bottom. We have been here for generations and we are American citizens yet we are the worst off."

A way Boriquas Unidos intends to tackle this problem is by bringing collegiate representation into the high schools of Massachusetts, in cities such as Holyoke, Springfield, Worcester and Boston.

"Even though we are located in the university, we want to go to the schools and show them it is possible to come here and further one's education," said Davila.

Studies show that Puerto Rican teens have both the highest high school drop-out rates and teenage pregnancy occurrences.

No officers have been appointed because individuals in the working group want to have democratic elections and offer all interested members a chance to vote.

One of the most specific goals mentioned by participants of the working group is the desire to unite Puerto Rican students who have been born and raised in the United States, with those that come to UMass directly from the island.

"We felt a necessity to bring the groups together. It's lack communication between two groups because of slightly different beliefs and opinions," said Wilma Crespo.

The differences emerge from the growing up in the United States versus growing up in Puerto Rico.

"They arrive here and see us dress a certain way and talk a certain manner, and belief the stereotypes that we must be in gangs or something," said Crespo.

"We need to put aside our differences to become more open-minded and not go along with the stereotypes," said senior Limaris Rivera, who grew up in the States. "I have always been shy to speak Spanish. My freshman year I felt they would make fun of the way I spoke it, but now I don't care."

Davila said, "Whether I was born in Puerto Rico or not, does not determine if I am Puerto Rican. My parents raised me in that culture. I could have grown up in Japan but I would still be Puerto Rican."

Book illustrates role of memory in Holocaust memorials

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusett's professor has taken a different approach to discussing the history of the Holocaust — through visual aids.

James E. Young, professor of English and Judaic studies, is the winner of the 1994 National Jewish Book Award, Holocaust category, for his book The Texture of Memory: Holocaust Memorials and Meaning.

The book presents 121 pictures and illustrations of Holocaust monuments in Germany, Poland, Israel and the United States, and discusses them in detail, Young said.

Young's book presents a new approach in looking at history and memories, and does this by showing patterns of "texture of memory in an accessible style," he said.

It is meant for a wide audience, he said. Many different departments such as, Judaic studies, history, art history, anthropology and political science, have begun using it as a teaching book.

"Every country around the world remembers the Holocaust in different ways," Young said. "Each country has different ideas about it's history and itself."

Although these ideas get transmitted through the monuments, the monuments have the ability to change history and the way it is remembered, Young said.

Young said he feels it is important to show how these monuments change history, by speaking about the way in which people have organized their present lives around given monuments.

If whole cultures organize, or

"If people identify with victims, they will act like victims."

define themselves in the way that documents have, historically, there could be dangerous consequences, Young said.

"If people identify with victims, they will act like victims," Young said.

It is important to remember all of the Jewish history in context, Young said.

The National Jewish Book Awards have been given each year since 1949, in different areas of literary presentations of the Holocaust.

Young traveled around for 15 years to every Holocaust museum in each country to do research for the book, while working on Writing and Rewriting the Holocaust, released in 1988, he said.

He has received a Guggenheim Fellowship, planning and exhibition grants from the National Endowment for the Humanities, a Fulbright award and a Yad Hanadiv Fellowship at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Young received a certificate, a $750 gift for this book, and is in the process of working on a new book, entitled A Vicarious Past: Two Received Histories of the Holocaust, he said.

Young has been a professor at UMass since 1988 and presently teaches a course entitled "Representing the Holocaust."

He has also taught at New York University, and Bryn Mawr College.

He did his dissertation at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and got his Ph.D. at the University of California, Santa Cruz.

Young hopes the award will inspire others to read the book as closely as he had hoped they would, he said.

Controversial leftist to lead task force

By Kim I. Mills
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The National Gay and Lesbian Task Force, a lobbying group beset by recent budget and personnel problems, has chosen a leftist San Francisco health commissioner as its new executive director.

Melinda Paras, 41, was named Monday by the task force's board to lead the 32,000-member civil rights and educational organization. Paras spent the last four months as the group's acting executive director after the previous officeholder, under pressure from the board, returned to her old job as public policy director.

But even before Paras was offered the post permanently, she drew fire from gay and lesbian activists for her leftist political views and for her role as a leader of the Shanti Project, a San Francisco AIDS service organization.

Paras has belonged to Marxist-Leninist political groups and was arrested in the Philippines in the 1970s, accused of working with guerrillas attempting to overthrow then-President Ferdinand Marcos. Paras resigned last year as deputy executive director of the Shanti Project amid charges that sloppy accounting records could not explain where the group had spent more than $300,000 in public funds.

In an interview, Paras said she has put the Shanti controversy behind her. The problems arose there because San Francisco was overwhelmed by the AIDS epidemic, she said. When the Ryan White AIDS funding law went into effect, she said, Shanti suddenly had a large infusion of cash and "we did not have some of the internal systems necessary to account for the changes in contracts." "There was never any money missing," she said. "We didn't have accurate enough accounting."

Nonetheless, Shanti agreed to stop providing housing at the city's request and to repay any money for which it could not account.

As to her politics, Paras made no secret of her leftist activities, although she said she was more involved in such activities earlier in her life.

Some gay activists were not mollified by that explanation. "I don't have any problems with her personally having these radical views," said Mickey Wheatley, a Washington gay activist and lawyer. "My concern is that her political views are so far out of the mainstream of gay and lesbian civil rights groups that she's not going to be able to do the work that needs to be done to make the kind of pragmatic gains that this movement wants and needs."

But the task force gathered a broad array of endorsements from other leaders of the gay and lesbian movement before announcing Paras' appointment. Elizabeth Birch, who was recently tapped to head the Human Rights Campaign Fund, the other Washington gay rights lobby, called Paras "a gifted manager."

pooch punt that the burly Todd Rucci downed at the New York one-yard line. With that said, and my adrenaline flowing at a feverish pace, I have a responsibility to go around the league and blanket the NFL's happenings.

So without further ado, let's get to the rolodex of the mind: Hugh!) Millen directed the Broncos to a thrilling 20– 17 win over Kansas City. From the highlights I saw, it sure looked like a game the Chiefs deserved to win . . . Look out for the Giants . . . The Cowboys new uniforms are soooo ugly, but the team is soooo good . . . Barry Sanders ran for 188 yards on 20 carries — somebody get him a Super Bowl ring . . . Call 1-800-BUDDY if you hate Buddy Ryan too . . . Are the 49ers a well-oiled machine or what? Over two games against Atlanta this season, they outscored Atlanta 92–17. . . Are the Buccaneers seriously winning two in a row? Must be a franchise record . . . Hats off to Jim Everett for beating his former team . . . The Oilers started Bucky Richardson at QB. Ouch! . . . The Steelers are nasty, and have 50 QB sacks this season . . . The Eagles certainly have crashed down to the NFL's mediocrity level after a fine start. Cleveland appears to be following them right down.

With another great weekend of football came another great weekend of tailgating. From what I've heard, Dave "Scotty" Scott and his sad bunch of buddies want out of the Tailgater of the Year poll. They must have gotten the scoop that they were soon to be ousted from consideration anyway.

You see, missing a "must–win" Patriots game calls for disqualification; that is, unless an excuse slip is handed in prior to kickoff. Scotty neglected to do so, and has paid the price. Hey big guy, don't grab the bull by its horns.

So in the mold of a New York Jets fan (as classy as they are), Scotty decided to back out with his buddies who were apparently throwing quite a few expletives in my direction Sunday. But we have no time to waste on CFL-type tailgaters, so let's get to the Top 5 of the NFL Tailgater of the Year Award, and we'll let Scotty and his pals vie for the Pop Warner Tailgating crown.

The Top 5: Double R, Doogie, Stuey, the tag-team of Souza and Al, and finally, myself.

Until next time, to all another great Sunday of football, and a great week of NFL (not CFL or Pop Warner) tailgating.

victory under their belt.

Both teams had their share of penalties, with both tripping and roughing. One penalty, though, stood out among the rest. Fighting at 16:50 was deemed the appropriate call for the Minutewomen's Susan Murray and Terry Revata for the Terriers. Revata picked up an extra 2:00 for instigating the brawl on the initial 5:00 she and Murray shared for agreeing to drop the gloves. The Minutewomen are becoming a more marked team, as they are undefeated and winning by large margins.

The Minutewomen will be back in action on Saturday at 2 p.m. in Middletown, Conn., where they will be facing the Wesleyan College Cardinals.

"Our performance shows what kind of character our team has, what kind of backbone," Newcomb said. "We're only half way there of how well we'll be able to swim, but I'm pleased."

The Minutewomen are preparing for an Atlantic 10 match–up at the Totman pool against Rutgers this Saturday when they will try to even their record at 2–2.

cross–country team members were absent after a long regular season. The team was also without the talents of junior Jen Waeger and freshman Kirsten Bringardner, who were sick all week.

In the 55–meter dash, freshman Emma Gardiner did well in her first collegiate competition, placing third with a time of 7.5 minutes. Forrest placed second with a time of 27.2 in the 200 meters. Freshman Silifata Kenku led in the 400 meters, but tired at the end to finish second with a time of 51.5. Freshman Kristen McCabe finished fourth with 63.3.

In the 4x400 meter relay, UMass placed second with a mixed team of sophomore Jesse Rutherford, McCabe, freshman Stacey Lavoie and junior Megan O'Neil, and a time of 4:18. In the 4x800 meter, it was neck and neck with a team of senior Kerry Aker, freshman Christy Martin, sophomore Kim Hargrave and senior Cheryl Lyons as anchor. They placed first with a time of 10:02.

Martin did very well in the 1500–meters, placing fourth with a time of 5:03. In the 3000–meters, senior Julie Moreau took first while sophomore Molly Dunlap took second.

"I'm pleased with the results," LaFreniere said. "We have a good shot at beating Northeastern next time when we get our distance runners back."

DO YOU THINK TIGERS GO TO THE SAME HEAVEN THAT PEOPLE GO TO?
I MEAN, IN HEAVEN, EVERYONE IS SUPPOSED TO BE HAPPY, RIGHT? BUT PEOPLE WOULDN'T BE HAPPY IF THEY WERE ALWAYS IN DANGER OF BEING EATEN BY TIGERS!
ON THE OTHER HAND, HEAVEN WOULDN'T BE VERY NICE WITHOUT TIGERS. EITHER I WOULDN'T BE HAPPY IF THEY WERE NOT ANY TIGERS TO MISS THEM
MAYBE TIGERS JUST DON'T EAT PEOPLE IN HEAVEN
BUT THEN WE WOULDN'T BE HAPPY

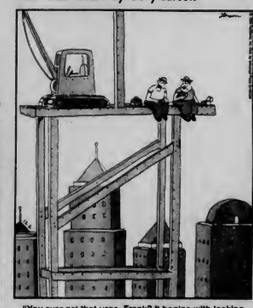
The Far Side By Gary Larson



"You ever get that urge, Frank? It begins with looking down from 50 stories up, thinking about the meaninglessness of life, listening to dark voices deep inside you, and you think, 'Should I? ... Should I? ... Should I push someone off?'"

Your Horoscope

By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Keep a sense of proportion if a relationship seems to be spinning out of control. Attempting to mix business with pleasure could prove costly. You may be better off working on your own today.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): You event-filled week could be the catalyst your thoughts this morning. A pleasant companion seems determined to stick with you through thick and thin. Show your appreciation. Let loved ones be who they really are.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Reassessing a complicated relationship shows you where things went awry. Be careful not to offend someone whose help you need. Envision yourself as a well-respected leader with clout. Your co–workers will concur.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Not a good time to trumpet your successes or brag about a recent triumph. Quietly seek a new approach to people you hope to impress. A beloved, but reclusive appearance will reassure legal worries.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Do not let a financial opportunity slip by unnoticed. Being balmy on the spot at work could lead to a promotion. Stay alert to sudden schedule changes. You have more artistic talent than you think.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Cordial relations with your co–workers could put you in an upbeat mood. A newcomer proves especially cooperative. Travel the two–way highway of romance. Rekindle a lost relationship that has fallen on hard times.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Basic tasks deserve prompt attention. Try to stick to a routine. You will be especially eager to break free from recent financial restrictions this evening. Thinking upgrades can result in a new purchase.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): You are advised to make real headway in the mountain of work today. Creative ideas abound! Put them down before they are forgotten. Romance heats up when you put more zing into shared activities.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): Fighting the inevitable will not work. Plunge into a clean–up campaign with zeal. Mop and polish until everything gleams. A special class or seminar will help you make better use of computer technology.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): A long–distance journey will lift your mind to new heights. Use your well–known powers of analysis. Going over your finances will let you know what you can afford to spend during the holidays.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Go ahead and let your imagination run riot! A little fantasy will help balance your head and heart. Try an experimental approach where the fine arts are concerned. Dazzle a loved one with your creativity.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Two heads are better than one today. Someone's cooperation helps you get a creative project moving in the right direction. A phone call brings news you will want to share with a trusted calm person.

Upon smashing the bottle on a green bananna tree to open it, I realized it was a copy of The Mass Daily Collegian! Immediately ! turned to the section containing the horoscopes to determine what my fate would be. Minutemen fall to fifth from first in AP poll

■ Loss to Kansas knocks UMass out of top spot after one week

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

The last three weeks have seen three different No. 1 teams in the NCAA college basketball Associated Press poll, and Massachusetts was the current victim knocked off the top.

The Minutemen, who evened their record at 1–1 by losing to Kansas, 81–75, in the John Wooden Classic on Saturday, fell to fifth place from last week's first ever No. 1 ranking.

Their No. 1 ranking was credited to Massachusetts after it demolished defending champion Arkansas 104–60 in the Tip- Off Classic on Nov. 25.

North Carolina, who had been leapfrogged by Massachusetts in last week's poll, became the new king of college hoop after sweeping the field in the Tournament of Champions this weekend.

UCLA, who defeated Kentucky 83–82 in the second game of the Wooden Classic, moved to second place, with Arkansas, Kansas and Massachusetts rounding out the top five.

Calipari said the ranking the Minutemen received was justifiable, considering the number of strong teams in the NCAA this season.

"We're probably about where we should've been," Calipari said. "There are probably about 15 teams who can be the number one team, and we're one of them."

In its loss to the Jayhawks, Massachusetts had a poor shooting day, especially from the free throw line (48 percent). That was down from the outstanding 40–for–50 performance from the charity stripe against Arkansas.

Including the foul shooting, there were major differences between the Minutemen that played against Arkansas and the ones that bowed to Kansas.

"We were the aggressor against Arkansas," Calipari said. "We stayed ahead of them, we controlled the tempo. We beat them to loose balls, outrebounded them, remained aggressive.

"We were ready to play against Kansas. They just played us the way we played Arkansas. [Kansas] controlled the tempo of the game, they beat us on loose balls and rebounds."

The Minutemen were roughed up by the Jayhawks under the boards by the likes of Raef LaFrentz, Greg Ostertag (6 blocks) and Scott Pollard, who combined for 39 points. Marcus Camby was dominated by the threesome, scoring just two points and pulling down five rebounds.

Lou Roe was the lone bright spot for Massachusetts, pouring in 33 points and grabbing 10 boards. The Minutemen proved that even Roe, who scored 34 points and had 13 boards against Arkansas, can't carry the entire load.

"We do not want him to have to shoot 25 times a game," Calipari said of Roe, who went 13–25 from the field. "We want him to get about 18. He can still be scoring the same amount of points if he continues to go to the line, but by not shooting as many shots.

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

Derek Kellogg (14) and the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team were not smiling on Saturday in the 81–75 loss to Kansas, and hope to regain their smile in Wednesday's home game against Pittsburgh.

Calipari noted that Roe approached him after the Kansas game, saying that he couldn't play 35 minutes each time out for the Minutemen to win.

"Lou came to me, saying he couldn't play 35 minutes a game," Calipari. "He said he needed a five minute break in both the first and second half. See how unselfish he is?"

• • • •

Minutemen notes: . . . Calipari was a guest on the ESPN show Upclose with Roy Firestone. The one–on–one talk show, which was televised last night, was taped last week when the Minutemen and Calipari made the coast–to–coast trip to California.

. . . John Wooden, considered to be arguably the greatest coach in college basketball history, was honored on Saturday at the Pond. At halftime of the Massachusetts–Kansas tilt, eight of his former players said a word or two about their thoughts on the legendary coach, and he received a standing ovation from the capacity crowd.

Calipari credits Wooden for his influence on his players both on the court and off.

"He helped them become champions, both on and off the court. He's someone to look up to, and we like to think we try to do the same thing he did here at Massachusetts," Calipari said.

Tailgaiters watch as Pats increase chance of making the playoffs

At sun–splashed Foxboro Stadium on Sunday, the Jets themselves were splashed by the upstart New England Patriots. Let's talk about euphoria. Let's talk about the playoffs. Oh yes, let's talk.

The Patriots are 7–6! Winners of their last four games! Right in the playoff hunt! Playing great defense! Picking up steam! Damn, I'm fired up about this.

For the second consecutive home game, I was in attendance in Section 307 leaning up against the press box at about the 50–yard line. Great seats for a great game. And at this time, I'd like to introduce a few of my comrades from the best section in the stadium who helped me break down the game on that fabulous Sunday afternoon.

Checking in from Peabody, perhaps the boldest Pats fan around — Stuey. The guy comes to the game in shorts and a t–shirt and is one of the most unpredictable characters around. He's the same guy that proposed to his wife on the scoreboard at a Pats game a few years back.

Mike Reiss on the NFL

Flanked to Stuey's right, from parts unknown — Link. The guy is one of the most die–hard Pats supporters of all time. A double–fisted beverage drinker (as most of the crew in 307 is), Link is the veteran spokesman of the section.

Of course Double R was there along with Jolly Rancher Man, who provides the section with half–time stats, and of all things, Jolly Ranchers. When a play did happen to slip by any one of us (a very seldom occurance), or any stats are needed, we simply turn to the press box behind us where the Herald's Kevin Mannix and the Patriot Ledger's Ron Hobson were there to greet us.

Now, with the section introduced for the most part, let's get on the game. The Pats defense held New York to 64 yards on the ground, and this statistic was crucial. The reason being that with Boomer Esiason's uncanny ability to use the play–action fake, shutting down the running game took that aspect of the Jets offense away.

On the other hand, New England ran the ball quite well. Where are all those trash–talkin' people that said the Pats had no running game? Anyway, with the defense playing inspired football, and the offense using a fine–looking ball– control attack, all that is left to analyze is the coaching and special teams.

Bill Parcells and his staff (credit to defensive coordinator Al Groh) have done a phenomenal job all year. Sunday was no exception.

And the special teams turned in one of the biggest plays of the day on Pat O'Neill's fake field goal

Women's hockey breezes past BU, improves to 4-0

By Jason Wall
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's hockey team won its fourth straight game this weekend, defeating Boston University 12–0.

The Minutewomen gave the 247 spectators at the William D. Mullins Center practice rink their best performance of the season, raising their record to 4–0.

There were contributions made by every player both on and off the ice. However, there were three Minutewomen who stood out on the ice, giving stellar performances both in the net and on the offensive attack. Ursula Slate, Jillian Langord and goaltender Cheri Ruane, who played her best game thus far, stopping every shot including a penalty shot by Terrier Lauren Stevenson.

The penalty shot was a result of the Minutewomen's defense, who were in pursuit of Stevenson as she skated in on a breakaway and was tripped up, giving BU the penalty shot. Ruane made a quick left pad save as Stevenson went for the bottom left corner of the net.

"I was really nervous," Ruane said. "But, I have a great team in front of me and they gave me the confidence to stop the shot."

This game not only called on the player between the pipes, Ruane had a productive offense in front of her, with two players tallying eight goals. Slate had five goals and Langord had a hat trick which lead to the team's season–best 12–0 shutout.

"Cheri played a great game today," Coach Smith said. "I think our team was a little bit faster getting to the puck, we're very competitive."

The Minutewomen, like most teams, have their share of superstars, but are proving that the weight of play can be distributed. Nadia Scocimara scored the first goal of the game at 17:10 to make it 1–0. Scocimara then unleashed a wrist shot from the top of the left circle, beating BU's goalie on her glove side.

Hillary Knowlton scored later at 7:30 in the second period, picking up the loose puck from a shot by Slate and beating the BU goaltender.

Joyce Miller stuffed the puck in on a rap–around shot at 13:53 in the second period.

Sandy Wright would seal things up with her unassisted goal at 15:40 in the third period, as the Minutewomen left the Mullins Center with 12 goals and another

Swim teams compete in New Englands

• Minutemen's eight–year reign ends

All good things must come to an end, and unfortunately that was the case for the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team this weekend.

The team's eight–year reign over the New England Championships came to a grinding halt on Sunday, in Kingston, R.I., as the University of Connecticut captured the crown, narrowly edging the Minutemen who finished second overall.

"They've been trying to knock us off for five years now," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "They finally caught up to us. My guys tried their hearts out, but [UConn] ended up on top."

"They've been trying to knock us off for five years now," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "They finally caught up to us."

Senior Tim Milbert of Bridgewater, had a strong day, as he captured the prestigious Bob Muir Award, which is presented to the senior who has accumulated the most points during his four–year career. Milbert captured the 100 yard breaststroke in a time of 58.66 seconds. He also took second in the 200–yard breaststroke, third in the 200–yard individual medley, and swam the second leg of the 200 and 400–yard medley relay. Both of those teams finished second only to the Huskies.

Keith McLarty, a junior from Beaver Creek, Ohio, proved to be the Minutemen's most valuable swimmer over the course of the weekend. McLarty won three races in all, as his 4:00.97 in the 400 yard individual medley set both a UMass and New England Championships record. McLarty set a UMass record by finishing the 200–yard backstroke in 1:52.55, and also captured first place in the 200–yard individual medley, where he posted a time of 1:53.02.

Still, this was not enough to prevent a pesky UConn squad from ending the Minutemen's eight–year winning streak at the championships. Having won the title every year since 1986, everyone, fans and swimmers alike, was looking for a major upset.

"It was us against the world and we couldn't hold off the world very well," Yarworth said.

UMass' medley relay team of McLarty, Milbert, Bob Coletti and Greg Menton swam hard, finishing second to UConn in both the 200–yard and 400–yard races. The 200– yard race saw the Huskies victorious by a narrow .47 seconds.

Menton anticipated high finishes in both the 50 and 100 yard freestyle races, but finished up at 21.88 and 47.87 respectively. Both times were well off of his 21.00 and 45.61 at last year's ECAC Championships.

The Minutemen, 3–1 on the season, will return to action Saturday afternoon when they host the Scarlet Knights of Rutgers at 3 p.m. in Boyden at Rogers Pool. While the team is preparing for Rutgers, the dual–meet rematch with Connecticut in Storrs on Jan. 21, suddenly has a

Karen Sonnwald and Jess Griffith combined for a 1–2 punch as the University of Massachusetts' women's swim team finished fourth place this past weekend at the New England Championships held at the University of Rhode Island.

"We finished exactly where I thought we'd finish," Coach Bob Newcomb said. "Everyone swam real well and we got good results out of it."

Sonnwald continued to shine, becoming the New England champion in the 500–yard and the 1650–yard freestyles. Sonnwald set school records in both events, beating the old 1650–freestyle by two seconds and shattering the old 500–freestyle record by five seconds.

"Anything is possible with her," Newcomb said. "I expected her to win."

Now at the season's mid point, Sonnwald's time of 5:02.95 in the 500–freestyle is only six seconds from qualifying for the NCAA Championships at the end of the season.

Co–captain Jess Griffith lead the Minutewomen with 76 points, finishing second in the 100–yard breaststroke, third in the 200–yard breaststroke, and sixth in the 50–yard freestyle.

"Jess swam her best controlled breaststroke I've seen her do," Newcomb said. "She's looking crisp and she's maturing real well."

"Not one individual person was in the spotlight. Everyone did great for this time of year, many of us swam our best times."

Griffith is quick to credit the whole team with the Minutewomen's success at the New England's.

"Not one individual person was in the spotlight," Griffith said. "Everyone did great for this time of year, many of us swam our best times."

The Minutewomen shared the spotlight, winning the 200– yard freestyle relay and finishing second, breaking a school record in the 800–yard freestyle relay, the longest–standing record in the record books.

"We erased the curse of the 800 relay," Newcomb said. "The old record was set in 1989, we've had the personnel to break it, we just haven't been able to put it all together until now."

According to Newcomb, the Minutewomen have a long tradition of "coming up big" when swimming relays at championship meets.

"The team is tight and devoted not to let each other down, that's why we do so well in relays," Newcomb said.

Senior Barbara Banks continued to swim well, finishing second in the 200–yard back stroke and third in the 100–yard back stroke.

"Barbara is a lot of fun to work with, she always trains real hard," Newcomb said.

According to Newcomb, the diving squad continues to improve lead by freshman Angelique Rodriguez.

Women's track falls between Northeastern and UNH

By Allison Connolly

This past weekend, the University of Massachusetts women's indoor track and field team placed second at a tri–meet with Northeastern University and the University of New Hampshire in Durham.

UMass finished in second place with a score of 50.5 points, Northeastern came in first with 84.5, and UNH finished third with a score of 13.

"I figured we would lose to Northeastern in this meet," Coach Julie LaFreniere said, "They are really strong in throwing, sprinting and jumping. But we were not at full force."

Three UMass runners qualified for the ECAC's in their very first meet of the season. Senior Janey Meeks qualified in the triple jump with a leap of 38.9 feet. Sophomore Anya Forrest and freshman Rosie Bryan both qualified in the 55– meter hurdles with times of 8.1 and 8.2, respectively.

"We had three outstanding performances from the qualifiers," LaFreniere said. "In the past, Northeastern has dominated in the hurdles. I think they were pretty surprised that we took first and third in this event."

Junior Christie Martin placed third in the 20–pound weight throw with 45.3 feet. She also set a personal record in the shotput with a throw of 41.3 feet. Although she placed fourth in this event, her showing was impressive because Northeastern has the top throwers in New England.

"To qualify for the ECAC's, she only needed a throw of 42 feet," LaFreniere said. "It is something that is definitely within reach."

UMass was also missing the throwing skills of sophomore Stephanie Townson, who was out with back problems.

In the long jump, Bryan came in second with a leap of 18.75 feet, and placed third in the triple jump with 36 feet 8 3/4 inches. Meeks took first place with a qualifying jump of 38.9 feet.

In the high jump, Meeks took fourth with a jump of 5 feet 4 inches.

"Janey Meeks had a great day," LaFreniere said. "Not only did she win the triple jump, but she never missed in the high jump until the 5.4 foot bar. The UNH competitor missed every height from 5.0 feet on, but then made the 5.4 foot jump. Janey had a better series but unfortunately that doesn't count."

Controversial lecture fuels student debate

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

In last night's heated speech, Wellesley College African- American professor Dr. Anthony Martin gave a history of persecution of Black leaders and Jewish involvement in the oppression and enslavement of African-Americans.

Martin, considered by some to be an anti-Semite because of his book, The Jewish Onslaught: Dispatches from the Wellesley Battlefront, was scheduled to speak about "Black Leaders Under Siege." Martin spoke for nearly two hours, ending in heavy questioning from some members of the Jewish community.

James E. Callahan III, a member of the sponsoring Nu chapter of Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity, Inc., gave a welcoming speech to the packed Bowker Auditorium.

Callahan said he was limited in what he could say, but urged the audience to open their minds and their hearts to what he could say.

"Each individual here has a perception of reality," he said. "I don't know what your perception is, but I know our grandparents are outliving our grandchildren, and our babies are having babies."

Black Student Union President Shomwa Shamapande then asked people to get involved by writing a letter to Chancellor David K. Scott expressing concern about the condition of the New Africa House and treatment of Black students on campus. He also urged fellow students to help others in need.

"Do something about providing opportunity and access at the University of Massachusetts to people who do not have opportunity and access," Shamapande said.

Callahan then returned to introduce Martin.

"I was told to talk about Black leaders under siege," Martin said.

Martin cited Black leaders throughout history who he said have been oppressed by many parts of society, including the U.S. government and its agencies. One example, Martin said, was a secret memorandum written by J. Edgar Hoover that said Marcus Garvey, the founder of United Negro Improvement Association, "is a fine orator and he is aggravating the Negroes. . . [Hoover] apologized that [Garvey] has not broken any federal laws."

Martin said despite all the problems of the past 500 years, Black people have survived and he attributed that to Black leaders.

"Leaders have played a very important role to that survival," said Martin. "This may be why Black leaders have come under such oppression and attack."

Martin also spoke on the formation of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in 1909, which was actually formed by "White people, Jews and gentiles."

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

Wellesley College professor Anthony Martin spoke on many subjects including Black leaders under siege and Jewish involvement in Black oppression during a lecture last night in Bowker Auditorium.

"W.E.B. Du Bois was the only Black executive on the board," Martin said.

Martin later said Du Bois was influenced to change his famous classic Souls of Black Folk, which caused a few outbursts from the audience.

"He was actually forced to allow some change to his famous classic," said Martin. "[The book originally read] 'Jews are heirs of the slave baron. . .' they made him change 'Jews' to 'immigrants.'"

In the middle of his history on the Jewish involvement of Black oppression, Martin said the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) was spying on Black leaders. A member of the audience yelled that the ADL was also spying on Jewish leaders.

"I express my anger against liars being Black, White or Jewish," the audience member said.

A short question and answer period followed Martin's presentation. Roughly 20 people stood in line waiting for a chance at the microphone.

Black, Jewish students react to Martin's speech

By Chris Conner and Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

Tensions between Black and Jewish students soared in the latter half of Dr. Tony Martin's speech, as the focus switched to negative Jewish involvement in Black history.

Many students from the two communities most heavily represented who were unable to express their opinions during the 15-minute question-and-answer session engaged in heated discussions following the provocative speech.

"The topic was supposed to be Black leadership," Jewish student and Hillel Treasurer Lynne Wolfson said. "As a Jewish student and Jewish leader on campus, I think that Martin's message had an anti-Jewish sentiment."

In reference to the relevance of Martin's speech, Wolfson said she felt that "when an issue is raised in the Jewish community, I don't make it a Black-Jewish issue. I make it a Jewish issue."

Black student Mike Butler also questioned the intent of Martin's speech. "I think he should have spoken on how to be a Black leader rather than just focusing on history. But obviously he's a good professor."

Ron Gonen, vice-president of University of Massachusetts Hillel, said, "When you discuss something in a historical context, you must blend all the pieces together, so that people can see the past clearly. If you do not, as Tony Martin unfortunately did not, you get a perspective that is erroneously skewed and most often malevolent."

African-American studies major Patrick Belizaire, a Black student, said, "My opinions were enhanced. What I like most is that he credits [W.E.B.] Du Bois, but brings out the truth about what everybody did.

"I think Jews played a major part in Black history, but I don't think we're trying to blame," Belizaire added. "We just want the facts."

"A wise Black man can never be respected by close- minded people," Black student Alton Byrd said. "He was treated like a boy. If people don't listen, how can they expect to change things?"

Hillel Secretary Lori Rapaport said, "I had never experienced such outright anti-Semitism in my life and I've never been in the midst of such a hostile environment before. I felt like people were glaring at us."

Sophomore Sonny Revas said, "I think he did speak exclusively on the Jewish community. But as a historian, he needs to point out things that aren't in the history books." He added that before he came to UMass, he hadn't known about the Jewish involvement in the slave trade.

Revas, who is Black, also said, "He didn't say anything anti-Semitic. He was exclusive, but I don't know where you draw the line as being anti-Semitic."

Sophomore Steve Simon, a Jewish student, said he thought that, "considering it was about Black leaders, I thought he spoke considerably about the 'Jewish conspiracy,' if you want to call it that."

Revas also added, "I wish there was less tension in this speech."

At the reception following the speech, Martin commented on the reactions from the two communities.

"I was very heartened and encouraged by the comments and questions from Black folk," Martin said.

The professor was more critical, however, of the Jewish audience members' inquiries.

"I was somewhat disappointed by the lack of historical facts,

1984 gay rally a historic date for GLB community

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

"We hold the University responsible for not creating a campus environment that is truly one of civility for lesbian, bisexual, gay people and our heterosexual allies," asserted the People's Gay Alliance on this date 10 years ago.

This statement was accompanied by a list of demands presented at a historic rally that marked the birth of the modern University of Massachusetts GLB community. As a result of this rally, the UMass administration began to take steps to investigate the climate, needs and services for the GLB community.

The origin of the Whitmore Administration Building rally can be traced to Dec. 6, 1984, when The Massachusetts Daily Collegian ran a front page story on events planned for Gay and Lesbian Day. This was an all day awareness event sponsored by the People's Gay Alliance, the equivalent of today's LBGA.

Posters appeared around campus to advertise the event, which was to include free balloons, hand-outs on GLB issues, and a "hug-a-homosexual" booth set up outside the Hatch.

Around the same time, flyers began to appear around campus calling students to a counter-protest, a "heterosexuals fight back" march from Southwest Residential Area to the Student Union steps. Once at the Student Union, organizers of the event planned to hang a dummy in effigy of the GLB community.

"I think a lot of heterosexuals don't support [gay rights]. It seems you never hear from the majority. They never protest because they think they don't have to," said Richard Gatnik, one of the organizers quoted in the Collegian the day of the event.

"Heterosexuals fight back" — and so do GLBs

For the GLB and ally community, the "heterosexuals fight back" march represented the culmination of a semester of confrontation between UMass administration, heterosexual students, and themselves.

In September 1984 the SGA Budget Committee voted on a motion to ban funding for "sexual preference groups." A huge uproar ensued, and in the end the motion was voted down.

Other incidents included a homophobic editorial that appeared in this newspaper and a decision by the SGA to put off funding for a campus-wide gay and lesbian awareness educator.

The "heterosexuals fight back" march served to unite the GLB and ally community to take a stand and force the administration to listen to their concerns. As a result of a series of planning sessions, informal talks and administrative meetings, the People's Gay Alliance (PGA) was able to organize a large counter-rally at Whitmore and assure that the UMass administration would pay close attention.

Whitmore rally diffuses protest march

On Dec. 7, 1984, more than 100 people gathered outside Whitmore to show support for the GLB community and its demands. They also positioned themselves to meet the planned march and dummy-hanging.

When the march convened at 10:30 that morning, however, it included only five people. The leader of the group, Richard Gatnik, announced that after meeting with PGA president John Jablonski for three hours, he and his floormates had realized that their actions were oppressive.

Hanging a dummy in effigy of the GLB community would have been "in poor taste," he admitted. He had decided to cancel the march and the dummy-hanging.

At this point the combined group walked to the Student Union, where GLB representatives and supporters addressed another crowd and presented their demands to the UMass administration.

Interim vice chancellor returning to faculty

Story to take semester sabbatical before returning to teach in history department

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN FILE

Outgoing Vice Chancellor for University Relations and Advancement Ronald Story.

University of Massachusetts Vice Chancellor Ronald Story has announced he will leave his position to resume his faculty position in the history department.

Story took the position as vice chancellor of University relations and advancement in June on an interim basis following Chancellor David K. Scott's removal of three high-ranking administrators last April.

While his appointment was on an interim basis, University spokeswoman Karin Sherbin said Story's announcement came as a surprise to many.

Scott said a national search for Story's replacement will begin immediately, with the goal of having a new person in place by July.

Before his appointment to the vice chancellor position, Story served for two years as interim vice president for academic affairs in the University president's office in Boston. Story declined a permanent position in the office offered by President Michael K. Hooker so he could resume teaching on the Amherst campus.

"I have always intended, for a variety of personal and professional reasons, to resume my history department duties in the not too distant future," Story wrote in a letter announcing his resignation.

Story has been a faculty member of the history department since 1972.

In an interview before taking the vice chancellor position, he said his work in the president's office was "fascinating," but said he missed scholarly work.

Story said the time seemed ripe to announce his resignation because there is already a search for someone to head the development office, and it made sense to merge the search for a vice chancellor with development experience at the same time.

Next fall, Story intends to take a sabbatical he had previously postponed in order to finish some projects he has been working on. One project is a biography on Charles Comiskey, owner of the Chicago White Sox during the "Black Sox scandal" in which eight White Sox players were indicted on charges of fixing the 1919 World Series against Cincinnati. The results of the series were declared invalid after eight of the players were found to have acted to intentionally lose. All eight players were barred from baseball for life after the scandal. Comiskey died in 1931.

"My time here has been enormously gratifying," Story wrote. "I've developed a deep appreciation of the talent of the people in this division, and all that you accomplish under trying circumstances against great odds, and I will remain your ardent champion

Lecture addresses misconceptions of mass media

By Hernon Rozemberg and Henry Brier
Collegian Staff

In an attempt to clarify misconceptions conveyed and created by the western mass media, Professor Mohammed Guessous asked last night, "To what extent is it true that political Islam represents a threat to democracy, development and progress?"

A member of the sociology department of the University of Rabat in Morocco, Guessous is also a political leader of the Socialist Union of Popular Forces (USFP) party. He addressed a crowd of approximately 30 listeners at Thompson Tower on the University of Massachusetts campus.

The lecture, entitled "Political Islam and the Struggle for Democracy in the Arab World," was presented by the Peace and World Security Studies (PAWSS), a program of the Five College Consortium.

Political Islam is now viewed as a great threat to the western hemisphere and the new global enemy that must be readily confronted, he said. "Islamism," or political Islam, has become "the new communism" of the western world, he said.

A specific example cited by Guessous was the new series of killings in Algeria, which he said are misinterpreted in the west as the result of Islamic fundamentalists. Many of these killings were actually committed by state, secret and police forces, Guessous said.

"Islamic conspiracy [is] here, there and everywhere," said Guessous, assuming the voice of a misinformed individual. Further misconceptions are carried over with the use of this "multiplicity of concepts" including "Islamic terrorists, Muslim militant, Muslim fanatics," he said.

Guessous next proceeded to analyze a "typology of political Islamism," consisting of four main aspects. The first he called "politico-centric" Islam: Here the Islamic religion is used as a political tool for the "expression of discontent and protest."

The "sociocentric" element was the cause of a "phenomenon of marginalization and alienation" which drew masses of people from the country-side into the urban centers, Guessous said.

The third aspect was the "metaphysical protest" intrinsic to the fundamentalist mentality, he said. He described this as including the personal feelings of Muslims regarding the negative and depressing situation of the current world community, which must be metaphysically -reanalyzed.

Finally, Guessous discussed the "spiritual protest" which also forms a crucial aspect to the Islamic world. This is the actual component which gives way to the spiritual renovations of Islamic fundamentalists, he said.

Guessous said that initial fundamentalism derived from the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt in the 1930s, which split into different groups, some more extreme, throughout the Islamic world. The reasons behind this rise of this very recent trend in the Islamic religion — that of fundamentalist tendencies — was basically caused by a determined movement to oppose western intervention in their homelands, Guessous said.

In tying this to the recent rise of fundamentalist forces, Guessous said that, although each group was uniquely different from the other, they all shared a common set of "determinant characteristics." These included the omnipresent influence of external factors within all the Annual mini–mall draws crowd to SUB

The Student Union Ballroom will be crowded this week as vendors have come from all over the region to participate in the annual mini-mall.

Students squeezed by each other yesterday as they tried to look at all the goods displayed on tables throughout the room. Vendors are selling pottery, crafts from around the world, clothing, music and posters.

The mall opened yesterday morning and will run through Friday. The hours are 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. every day.

According to Jessica Lopatin, who organized the mini- mall, the event is one of the University of Massachusetts Hillel's largest and most successful fundraisers.

The Drop Zone in Hadley, said that his store has been coming to the mini-mall for six years, according to employee Jeff Vickowski. He said they usually make a good profit and that it was good advertisement for the store. Vickowski also added that he had never had any problems at the mini-mall.

Sheri Lovegore, a junior at UMass who had just bought a scarf for her housemate, said she had come in because she didn't have enough time to buy Christmas presents, and it "seemed like a good idea. It seemed interesting." Lovegore also said she was satisfied with the mini-mall and that it had "a lot of good things and there were pretty good prices."

Another student, sophomore Ryan Harris, said he definitely might buy something after looking around and noticing a poster when he followed a friend into the mini-mall.

New benches to grace Bartlett lobby

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

In the wake of criticism concerning the condition of academic buildings at the University of Massachusetts, the English department is furnishing the lobby of Bartlett Hall.

Eleven benches now sit in the academic building's lobby, which previously was without seats.

"We hope they'll be inviting seating for students," said John Nelson of the English department, "especially in the winter when it is not nice enough to be outside."

The cast iron and mahogany benches weigh 65 pounds and resemble Victorian-era railway benches, according to Nelson.

Recently retired and current English faculty donated the money to purchase the benches, Nelson said.

"The benches were donated by professors to make the lounge more comfortable for students," he said.

Yesterday afternoon, Nelson, Ron Welburn and Joe Bartolomeo assembled the benches and placed them throughout the lobby.

Nelson said they will be a place for students to sit and chat in between classes or study. Before the benches were in place, students sat on the sills of the heaters and on the stairs.

The timing of the decorating came at a time when the University has been receiving attention for the poor condition of certain academic buildings, in particular the New Africa House.

The benches will be bolted down because Nelson said there is "no other way to do it." Previously, he said, he brought two chairs and a love seat to the lobby — which lasted two days.

"They are probably in someone's living room," he said.

Nelson said he hopes to hang a plaque in the lobby to recognize the donors of the benches and "their contribution to facilitate student life."

Helms claims presidential threat wasn't serious

By Paul Nowell
Associated Press

WINSTON-SALEM, N.C. — Sen. Jesse Helms lambasted reporters Tuesday for creating a furor over his remark that President Clinton would need a bodyguard if he visited a North Carolina military base.

Helms said the remark was made privately, and he demanded to know why reporters didn't pursue a CBS report that it was said in jest.

"Answer my question. Why didn't anybody do that?" he asked. "Or have I struck you dumb? You stood out here wanting to interview me, now answer my question."

Surrounded by reporters as he left the annual meeting of the state Farm Bureau, Helms said his comment about Clinton was "never a threat and everybody knew that."

In a Nov. 21 interview, the North Carolina Republican said Clinton was hugely unpopular among military personnel, thousands of whom live in his state. "Mr. Clinton better watch out if he comes down here. He'd better have a bodyguard," Helms told the Raleigh News & Observer.

He later issued a statement calling the remark a mistake. Pointing his finger around at reporters, he challenged them to pursue the CBS story that the News & Observer reporter admitted the comment was made during a lighthearted conversation.

He also said the comment was made during a private conversation and that the word "jokingly" was edited out of the story. The News & Observer's government editor, Van Denton, disputed Helms' assertions.

"It was an on-the-record interview," he said.

Denton also said the word jokingly was not edited out, but that the newspaper indicated it did not consider the statement serious by using it deep in a story that was not prominently displayed. Helms said he visited with the president recently and took along his granddaughter.

One woman asked Martin why the Black community and the Jewish community cannot work together to repair their divided relations.

"Yes. I think it's a good idea to collaborate," Martin said. "The problem is Jewish people try to nullify and dictate Black people."

The questions were cut short due to time constraints, and some people became enraged, yelling, "We have our right to free speech as well."

Demands included establishment of a professionally staffed office of gay, lesbian and bisexual concerns to coordinate a "media project" and cultural and educational activities. Another demand was for the UMass library and curriculum include more materials relevant to the lives of GLBs.

Gay and Lesbian Day proceeded as planned, and except for a bomb threat that disrupted a PGA dance that night, there were no further confrontations. The rally at Whitmore and at the Student Union made the front page of the Collegian.

In the months following, the UMass administration agreed to undertake a series of interim steps designed to address the demands and concerns of the GLB community on a short- term basis. Steps included undertaking a systematic evaluation of the climate, needs, and services for GLB students.

The final report on the situation, compiled by Human Relations Planner and Advocate Felice Yeskel and released in the spring of 1985, served as the blueprint for the modern UMass GLB community.

Christmas parties provide good VIBES

By Andrew Ferguson
Collegian Staff

Area children will get an early taste of the holiday season at two Christmas parties today.

Over 150 children from the Amherst Survival Center have been invited to attend one of two parties hosted by the University of Massachusetts VIBES program, according to Melissa Piskosz, co-coordinator of the organization.

The parties are being held at the North Congregational Church on North Pleasant Street, located across the street from Daisy's, from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. and 6 p.m. to 8 p.m.

"The kids come, we have food, Christmas videos, cards and just basically have fun," Piskosz said.

Besides the fun and food, the children also get an early Christmas present, according to Piskosz.

"The gifts were all donated, they came from Milton Bradley and local businesses. We give every kid a gift," Piskosz said. "We've invited these kids as long as I've been here."

Piskosz, a senior in the School of Management, has volunteered at VIBES (Volunteer Initiative Blending Education and Service) for the past three years.

VIBES is a volunteer program located in SOM that has a staff of five students in SOM as well as three advisors.

"We all work together to plan the event," Piskosz said.

VIBES also has a reference book for people who wish to volunteer their time.

"The book has a list of about 100 agencies in the area where people can volunteer," Piskosz said.

Volunteers come not only from SOM but from all over campus, and there are plenty of volunteer opportunities for everyone, according to Piskosz.

"We work with lots of agencies from the area and Northampton," Piskosz said.

'U. Plan' to make college more affordable

Inexpensive state bonds help Massachusetts students

By Robert W. Trott
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state launched a savings plan Tuesday that will let parents sock away money now for their children's college education and "lock in" current tuition rates.

"Parents can now bank on being able to afford to send their children to some of the best colleges and universities in the country, which happen to be right here in Massachusetts," Gov. William Weld said.

Under the "U. Plan," people can buy state bonds — for as little as $25 a month — that later can be cashed in to pay for tuition and mandatory fees at participating colleges.

The colleges guarantee they will charge the tuition rates that existed when savers began buying the bonds, and will honor that rate no matter when they are cashed.

If the child doesn't attend a participating college, parents receive their full money back, with interest adjusted for inflation.

"We expect that thousands of people will benefit from the opportunity to pay for tomorrow's tuition at today's prices," said Treasurer Joseph Malone, whose office will issue the college tuition bonds. "A college education is an integral part of the American dream."

Shawmut Bank agreed to promote the plan and process the applications. Beginning Feb. 1, the bank's 350 branches will make applications available to customers.

The U. Plan will enroll investors from Feb. 1 to March 30. Peter Mazareas, executive director of the Massachusetts Educational Financing Authority, said 54 colleges and universities had signed up and more were considering the program.

While other states have similar programs, Mazareas said, Massachusetts was the first to include private schools, like Boston University.

Islamic communities that have affected the Muslim's way of life.

According to Guessous, the training of guerilla forces by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and other intelligence agencies that were put in place by the west as fighters of the communist threat has had a tremendous backlash of violent reaction that shaped the strategies of some fundamentalist groups.

Other common characteristics are that they do not usually take on the character of political parties, that they represent radical opposition to current political structures, and, finally, that they all believe in the guidance of Islam as the ultimate and infallible source of wisdom, Guessous said.

Overall, Guessous exposed how political Islamists or fundamentalists have formed such organizations as a form of resistance to oppression and injustice. However, Guessous said, that is as far as fundamentalists go. They have no set ideas of how to proceed on constructing new societies, that being the ultiniate decision of Allah. What they do have knowledge of, he said, is how to overthrow old regimes in power.

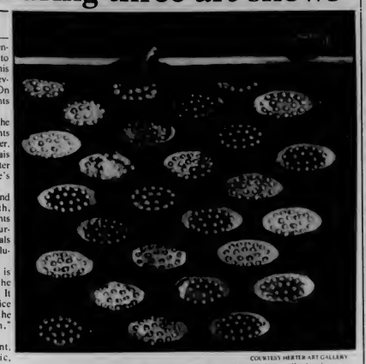
Herter featuring three art shows

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff



COURTESY HERTER ART GALLERY
Stuart Elster's untitled acrylic and watercolor painting is on display in one of three new art exhibits at Herter.

Herter Gallery has been instrumental in bringing artistic awareness to the campus community. Earlier this semester, the gallery showcased several components for the "Banned On Campus" series that exposed students to the issue of censorship.

Now, three new exhibits grace the gallery's walls. Since Nov. 13, "Saints and Sanctuaries," by Paula Hodecker, "In Transit" by Carlos Cruz Corais and "Fair Grounds," by Stuart Elster have been on display for people's viewing pleasure.

Drawing from her knowledge and involvement in the Catholic faith, artist Paula Hodecker created "Saints and Sanctuaries" from everyday furniture and other mundane materials to express her interest in the "evolution and passage of the soul."

"My use of religious imagery is based on Catholic culture, and the evolution and passage of the soul. It is not a parody but a visual device used to symbolize the ideas of the spiritual and physical death," Hodecker said.

Using mixed medias like paint, fake jewelry, glitter and fabric, Hodecker turns each piece into a sanctuary such a small shrine. All these things have meanings within themselves to further illustrate her message.

"The family dog, the garden and water are also themes used to symbolize the true goals and pleasures of life: living things that are energized in stark contrast to the commercial materialism that is enslaving our planet," Hodecker said.

Appearing with Hodecker's work is the life size images by artist Carlos Cruz Corais. "In Transit" features several relief print self portraits are created by the use of wood cuts and other medias. These images aren't meant to reveal the Corais as an artist, but rather a fictional image the artist creates of himself.

"'In Transit' is the consequence of going through the experience of impermanence in the reflective surfaces of mirrors and lenses," Corais said.

According to Carol Struve, Acting Director for the Herter Gallery, both Hodecker and Corais graduated from UMass. Hodecker received her BFA in Sculpture from the University in 1989 and currently teaches at Springfield College. In addition to teaching, she also works at the Zone Gallery in Springfield.

Corais is a MFA candidate in print-making at the University and will finish his degree this month. He also received his BFA from the University and currently teaches Portuguese here as well.

The third exhibit featured is a collection of oil paintings by Stuart Elster entitled "Fair Grounds." These abstract paintings are a mixture of images and elements that ask viewers to question spatial relations with other objects in each piece. Elster uses his talent to question naturalistic painting and our perception of illusion and reality.

"This transformation of subject represented by material is the illuminating, illusion. The trick is exposed in the state of its own presentation. The painting addresses artifice at the moment of being present," said Elster.

Each of these three exhibits offer a unique opportunity to explore different artist ideas and perceptions while offering a glimpse at the different forms art and creativity can take.

These three exhibits run thru Dec. 22. Herter Gallery is located in Herter Hall. Gallery hours are Monday thru Friday, 11 a.m. – 4 p.m. All exhibitions are free and open to the public.

Center hosts benefit coffeehouse

By Emily Marino
Collegian Staff

If coffee, baked goods, live music and showing support for Everywoman's Center are high on your list of priorities, Thursday night's coffeehouse sponsored by the People's Market will be something to check out.

From 7 to 11 p.m. the Student Union Commonwealth Room, where Earthfoods Cafeteria normally sells vegetarian lunches, will be transformed into a coffeehouse.

Desserts baked and donated by Earthfoods, Greenough snack bar and Orchard Hill's Sweets and More, along with coffee and tea from People's Market will be for sale, and the music of six live, local bands will contribute the event, free of charge. All proceeds will go the Everywoman's Center, a campus–based women's organization.

"It will be fun," said Julie Adelsberger, one of the three People's Market employees who organized the event.

"It is for a good cause. The Everywoman's Center is a good organization, and this is good recognition for them. It's a good opportunity to give people an idea of the programs they run."

The Everywoman's Center offers year–round counseling, advocacy, support groups, and educational workshops to deal with the issues and raise awareness of the problems of rape, battering, sexual assault and sexual harassment which afflict women.

Information on the Center will be available at the coffee house.

Adelsberger, who has worked at the Market for seven semesters, said that she has been working on a committee of three Market employees called Outnations, which stemmed from the Outreach and Donations committees of the Market.

Angela Norman and Chris Olson complete the committee.

Outnations is responsible for allocating a monthly $80 donation from the Market to the campus organization of their choice.

The committee's first money donation was given to the W.E.B. Du Bois Library.

"It was my idea to donate the money to Everywoman's Center," said Adelsberger. "Everyone else added the coffee house idea, because we have done them before."

Olson put up a sign in the Market appealing to bands to inquire about playing at the coffeehouse. By word of mouth, Olson contracted six local bands that will play a variety of folk and blues, such as the Chet Keefe Band.

The trio also worked to enlist the help of other Registered Student Organizations (RSOs). Campus Design and Copy donated fliers announcing the event, the Valley Women's Voice donated advertising space, and the TIX ticket agency donated time to help set up on the day of the event.

"We wanted to do something to get all the RSOs to work together," said Adelsberger. She said that while Earthfoods and People's Market are located in close proximity and often work together, she wanted the Market staff to get a chance to get to know other organizations.

"We also want to meet our customers," said Sarah Foudy, a two–year veteran of the Market.

Foudy said that past coffee houses have been successful and fun, but that lack of organization has prevented the Market from sponsoring more. "I think it's more fun when it doesn't happen all the time," said Foudy.

For more information regarding Thursday night's coffee house stop by the People's Market, located in the Student Union.

Gift books for everyone on your list

NEW YORK — Does your coffee table have wobbly legs or loose joints?

You'd better shore it up before someone gives you the 20-pound Great Art Treasures of the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg, published by Abrams.

The two-volume set, a true heavyweight in size and style, is part of the weighty and lavish array of "coffee table" books available for this gift-giving season.

This year's selectionoffers a subject to suit nearly every interest, be it Monet or manhole covers, the Sistine Chapel or the Shenandoah Valley.

There are books about duck decoys and doll's houses, about wallpaper and wildlife, about the architecture of Islam and about Israel.

An art education can be as simple as A-B-C with The Art Book (Phaidon). This alphabetical guide to artists, from Jacques-Laurent Agasse to Francisco de Zurbaran, includes color examples of the works of 500 great painters and sculptors, from medieval times to the present.

Leonardo, Michelangelo, Botticelli and Raphael are among the painters whose works are displayed among the 800 color plates in Paintings in the Uffizi and Pitti Galleries (Bullfinch, $100) by Mina Gregori et al. This boxed, 600-page volume features 800 works of art from the Florence museums, one of the greatest collections of European art.

The lion is king of the jungle — too, thanks to The Lion King. A keepsake for fans of the Disney animated feature, The Art of 'The Lion King' (Hyperion) features color and black-and-white illustrations that re-create the film from its concept to the finished product. Text by Christopher Finch retells the tale and describes the inspiration behind the art.

The popularity of angels has sprouted wings of late: In Cherubs: Angels of Love (Bullfinch), text by Alexander Nagel and 125 color reproductions of cherubs in art herald the chubby, winged "pictures of innocence." Included are a four-page gatefold spread, removable Valentine card in envelope, a pop-up page and translucent acetate overlays.

Big Chief, The Goats bring alternative funk to Pearl Street

This Thursday night Pearl Street in Northampton will host a night of alternative funk as Big Chief and The Goats take the stage.

Big Chief, who have released a handful of singles including one on the Sub Pop label, are currently touring for their latest album Platinum five.

While most bands are content with just focusing of one type of sound, Big Chief is notorious for jumping all over the stylistic map.

Formed in 1989, the band began developing there groove- orientated rock, eventually adding elements of hip hop and funk into the mix. By 1992 the band had their first proper full-length album out on Sub Pop and were touring across the country with the likes of the Beastie Boys and The Cult.

For Platinum five, the band made a switched to the newly formed Revolution label and employed producer Phil Nicolo whose past work with Cypress Hill, Urge Overkill and Aerosmith made him the perfect choice for the bands eclectic sound. "

Opening the show will the alternative rap act The Goats, whose progressive style of rap took the world by storm last year.

Big Chief and The Goats will play Pearl Street on Dec. 8. The show is 18+. Contact Pearl Street for more information.

"Sir, your slur is showing": a response

Churchill not a great statesman for Third World

Farhan Shahab & Faisal Ansari

Make-believe is an important feature of keeping the peace. Translated in real terms, it means controlling the levers of power and privilege. It sounds crude and simplistic but this is the core truth of the political establishment across the globe.

It took centuries for this reality to take root and become globalized, leaving solutions and radical stirrings on the wayside — dead. What survives is a seamless uniformity of the dominant global culture and ideology which might put the dull communist era to shame. But comparisons, as they say, are odious. Besides, what's the point of flogging dead horses?

Yet, it is instructive and axiomatic to note that our present has so much to do with our past. The European conquest of the world not only changed history, but also the ways of looking at history. Self interest, treachery and violence, in that order, were the guiding principles of that conquest. Today those principles form the pillars of western domination of the world. (It is not for nothing that Henry Kissinger unctuously urges the U.S. administration to base its foreign policy on self interest. And, as we all know by experience, American self interest does not stop at American shores).

Myth-making was and continues to be an important part of this domination. All kinds of slaughters and land-grabbing have been clothed in self-righteous terms, as a call to duty, the White man's burden, a divine mission, a civilizational project. Politicians lionized as statesmen have blared this to the popular imagination. In recent years we had Ronald Reagan, who for the first time in American history became a perfect ventriloquist for the entrenched classes. His bluster earned him the badge of a great communicator even as he acted as a dummy for big business.

And not so long ago, the hard-nosed imperialist Winston Churchill was hyped as a great statesman. It's only recently that historians have started knocking his fair image to pieces.

Over the decades, though, the middle class has revered him as a man of wit and repartee, and well-behaved intellectuals have celebrated his achievements. Indians hated him for calling Gandhi a "half-naked beggar." But today, given the mood of times, half of liberalized-globalized Indians might agree with Churchill — with a chuckle.

Churchill was well known for his vile tongue and mean mentality. What is little known is how far he was prepared to go to put his contempt into practice — obviously, in the service of the Empire. In 1920, when the Iraqis rebelled against British rule, Churchill authorized the use of chemical weapons "against recalcitrant Arabs as an experiment." He said, "I cannot understand the squeamishness about the use of gas...I am strongly in favour of using poisoned gas against uncivilized [Arab] tribes" which he anticipated would "spread a lively terror."

Another British prime minister, George Lloyd, observed, "We insisted on the right to bomb the niggers," when the British diplomacy prevented the 1932 disarmament convention from banning the bombardment of civilians.

Sir Arnold Wilson, Churchill's compatriot, in reaction to the Iraqi uprising, which came as a blow to the Empire immediately after the debilitating First World War, said, "To kick a man when he is down is the most popular pastime of the East, sanctioned by centuries of practice and precept."

Racist slurs are not the monopoly of the British — or any one nation or people for that matter. But when the Europeans went out to discover new lands, they carried with them a cultural baggage and a world view which made them look superior to the colonized people. Besides, they were the victors and reserved "the right" to hold the vanquished in utter contempt — to degrade their cultures, to make fun of their looks, to insult their religions and to destroy their lands and slaughter them by the millions.

Most of these massacres have been meticulously documented by historians. But no Spielberg has yet ventured to make a Schindler's List on them. Maybe because the victims were not White and therefore not completely human. There were, as Churchill and many of his ilk would vouch, "black baboons," "worthless Arabs," "Chinese chinks," "beastly Indians," "Malay bandids," "half-breed Vietnamese" and so on. They deserved to die, for their own good.

The colonization of America not only added a new dimension to cruelty but also brought the White man's racism into sharp relief. American Indians were reduced from 10 million to 200,000 by the colonial savagery. The first U.S. president, George Washington, had this to say about Native Americans: "Indians have nothing human except the shape — the extension of our settlements will certainly cause the savage, as the wolf, to retire; both being beasts of prey, though they differ in shape."

And for the slave-owning parson of democracy and freedom, Thomas Jefferson, the Indians and Blacks were savages and no more. But he reserved his choice disdain to the British, whom he desperately wanted to defeat to complete his conquest of the New World. Laurence Kaplan in his book Diplomatic History writes that in 1785 Jefferson wrote in a letter to a friend, "I fancy it must be the quantity of animal food eaten by the English which renders their character insusceptible to civilization. I suspect it is in their kitchens and not their churches that their reformation must be worked." Years later he expressed his fervent hope that French armies would liberate Great Britain, improving both its cuisine and character. Alas, that was never to be.

To return the compliment, the Oxford dons, in another context, wished that Harvard professors would not visit their august university as they were wary of the basic elements of a mass democracy. And it's mass democracy that send shivers down the spine of the ruling classes. Mongasuthu Buthelezi's chief in South Africa dodged the ballot box precisely for this reason. Who can blame him though, when established democracies the world over have become the centers of private profit and power?

Racist slurs hide a fundamental truth. The rich and powerful scorn other peoples and cultures not just because they are of different color and race but primarily because they are ordinary, poor and too may in number. The masses of people, Black or White, have always inspired terror among the well-to-do.

Thomas Jefferson, writes James Morgan, was of the view that power should be in the hands of the "natural aristocracy" — who defend property right from the poor. The founding fathers of America expressed the reign's doctrine in terms that "the people who own the country, ought to govern it." Subsequent generations of American rulers have more than kept the promise by making sure the rest of the world followed suit, too — under U.S. tutelage, that is.

After the Second World War, Churchill further articulated the doctrine in these words: "The government of the world should be entrusted to satisfied nations. If the world government was in the hands of hungry nations, there would always be in danger. We were like rich men dwelling at peace within their habitations."

Churchill's partiality for the rich was matched by his passion for racial purity. He held his own people in contempt — people who were poor and impure. As home secretary in 1910, he secretly proposed sterilization of 100,000 "mental degenerates" and dispatched tens of thousands of others to state-run labor camps to save the "British race" from inevitable decline if its "inferior" members were

Minutemen hope to rebound against Pitt

After a tough game with Kansas, UMass looks for win tonight at Mullins

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

Playing against the likes of Arkansas and Kansas in its first two games, the timing of tonight's game could not be better.

The No. 5 University of Massachusetts men's basketball team makes a comforting return to the William D. Mullins Center to take on Pittsburgh— the same Pittsburgh who is projected to finish dead last in the Big East by many of the preseason polls.

The Panthers (1-2), who finished with a 13-14 record last year and lost the services of center Eric Mobley to the Milwaukee Bucks of the NBA, do not have much else returning. A harsh blow to Pittsburgh hit in September, when guard Jerry McCullough sustained a knee injury that subsequently required surgery, taking him out for the season.

McCullough, an All-Big East third-team pick and a two- year starter at point guard who averaged 13.3 points and 7.0 assists per game last season, will have to be replaced in terms of both playing ability and leadership qualities.

When overachiever Orlando Antigua becomes the returning focal point, you know you have a dilemma. Antigua, the 6-foot-7-inch Panthers captain, averaged 10.7 ppg and 4.4 rpg and has improved his shooting range the last couple of seasons. Without McCullough or a capable supporting cast, Antigua is unable to be the role player he has developed into in his career at Pittsburgh.

Yet, if there is an up-and-coming coach to rebuild this shredded program left by Paul Evans, Ralph Willard could be it. A Rick Pitino-disciple, Willard helped the present Kentucky coach revitalize the New York Knicks in the NBA before moving on to help reconstruct Pitino's Wildcats in Lexington.

Willard became coach of the Hilltoppers in 1990, and in four years, compiled an 81-42 record (.659). That includes an NIT berth, two Sun Belt Championships and two NCAA Tournament bids (including the Sweet 16 during the 1993- 94 season).

Willard's name, which is usually mentioned up and around the name of Massachusetts' John Calipari as one of the top young coaches in America, has taking on the difficult task. With the loss of McCullough, the key for Willard is to get through this season, and start fresh with his own recruiting class.

> "It's going to be a rough one. They're well-coached, and they come right after the jugular. We will not take them lightly."
> Coach John Calipari

Tonight, Willard's Panthers will have a handful with the Minutemen, who fell four spots from the No. 1 ranking after their 81-75 loss to Kansas in the inaugural John Wooden Classic on Saturday afternoon in Anaheim, Calif.

Lou Roe has taken his play up yet another notch, and is averaging an astounding 33.5 ppg and 11.5 rpg after his first two games. For his efforts, the 6-foot 7-inch, 220-pound Roe captured the Atlantic 10 Player of the Week award for the week ending Dec. 3.

Roe continued his explosive play in big games. In five games against top 10 opponents during his career, the senior co-captain is averaging 29.6 ppg and 11.2 rpg. Those numbers include this season's games against No. 1 Arkansas and No. 7 Kansas and three games from last year — No. 1 North Carolina, No. 4 Kansas and No. 7 Kentucky.

One thing Calipari noted, and Roe agreed upon, was the fact that the 35 minutes and the 25 shots taken against Kansas were too many. Calipari would be more pleased to have Roe taking 18 shots, with a chance of getting the same number of points coming from the free throw line.

Mike Williams returned to action in last Saturday's game, fouling out with over six minutes to play. The 6-foot 2-inch guard was anxious to finally get into the lineup after serving a three-game suspension for team academic violations.

The Jayhawk game was not a memorable one for center Marcus Camby, who scored just two points against the Kansas frontcourt. Calipari noted that it wasn't just Camby that received a loss.

"Marcus did not cost us the game, and we do not expect him to get 20 points and 20 rebounds each time out," Calipari said. Camby could be a force in tonight's game, considering the weak Panther frontline.

Massachusetts may very well play much of the bench in tonight's game. Calipari, however, still thinks it's going to be a challenge for his team.

"It's going to be a rough one," Calipari said. "They're well-coached, and they come right after the jugular. We will not take them lightly."

Minuteman lineup needs a shake-up

Kittles, Villanova run into Tar Heels in the Dean Dome

Passion. Intensity. Aggressiveness. These words characterize the top players in America. They also define Massachusetts basketball when the Minutemen are playing at their best. Yet last Saturday against Kansas in the Wooden Classic, something was missing.

It wasn't Lou Roe, who after three weeks of the season, is by far the best player in the nation. Roe has regained the fire which was missing in some games in 1993 and seems to be willing to carry the Minutemen on his shoulders. One problem, though, is that Massachusetts must follow Roe's lead.

Art Stapleton Jr.
On College Basketball

Against Kansas, it was obvious that some players didn't want it bad enough.

Massachusetts Coach John Calipari must take charge now and make sure his team is ready to finish out the 1994 year with only one loss, that defeat coming at the hands of Kansas. Calipari is on the money when he says that victories in December are not as important as wins in March, yet the Minutemen need a big road triumph to salvage the early part of their season.

Yes, Massachusetts can win at home. And in Springfield, too. But what about a victory this Saturday against Maryland in Baltimore to silence the doubters who are now saying that Massachusetts' season-opening win over Arkansas was a fluke?

This game is also a return-bout from last season's NCAA tournament contest in Wichita, Kan., when the tenth-seeded Terrapins shot 70 percent from the field and sent Massachusetts back to Amherst for the season.

If Marcus Camby plays like he did against Kansas, Maryland's Joe Smith will exact his revenge on Massachusetts' sophomore center, who scored a career-high 32 points on Smith in March.

It may be a good idea for Calipari to shake up his starting line-up for the next couple of games. Last season, Roe was benched by Calipari because he wasn't "starting with the intensity or the fire he needs to."

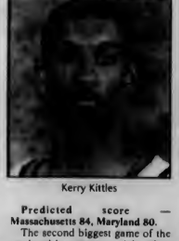
"Whether he starts or not, the point is to take the heat off him and just go play ball," Calipari said about Roe when he benched him against Rhode Island on Super Bowl Sunday.

The pressure on Camby has been building up since pre- season magazines came out, and it is time for Calipari to take some heat off of his future star.

Dana Dingle could be a starter on many Top 25 teams, and should return to the Minuteman starting line-up as well. This move would slide Roe in the middle and keep Donta Bright as the other forward.

Bring Camby off the bench for a while — he'll be fresh when his opponent is weakened. The opposing offense would not be accustomed to his presence in the paint and his quickness would be an asset.

It is more important to finish the game than start it.



Kerry Kittles

Predicted score — Massachusetts 84, Maryland 80.

The second biggest game of the weekend is tomorrow night when No. 23 Villanova looks to knock off No. 1 North Carolina in the Dean Dome in Chapel Hill. 'Nova is a scary team which should challenge for the Big East crown, both in the regular and post-seasons.

The most underrated player in the nation, Villanova's Kerry Kittles, is as dynamic as there is in the country. Wildcat Coach Steve Lappas left Manhattan and is beginning to build a winner at 'Nova. Kittles, along with Jason Lawson, Eric Eberz and a new-improved logo, will shake down some of the overrated teams in the East.

As far as Carolina goes, one of the top three players on the campus may not be coached by Dean Smith. Charlotte Smith, the other No. 23 on Tobacco Road, is a star for the Lady Tar Heels, who probably have a better shot at making the Final Four than their male counterparts.

Predicted score — Villanova 76, North Carolina 75.

Connecticut is the epitome of a school which does not care one bit about its brethren within its state. Coach Jim Calhoun and his Huskies have made a point over the last two seasons to pound intrastate rivals Central Connecticut State and Yale. In 1993, the mighty Huskies buried Central Conn. 117-63. Just last week, UConn drubbed Yale, 105-53.

What a way to improve basketball in the state of Connecticut! It's one thing to grant these lowly teams games against the big daddy of them all in the Constitution or Nutmeg State (whichever one you prefer), as if that means anything. But to absolutely embarrass these programs, which don't have the talent, coaching or facilities that Connecticut does, that really shows the class of Calhoun.

Massachusetts gave up playing the Boston Universities and Holy Crosses of the world in exchange for teams like Pennsylvania and St. Louis, NCAA tournament teams, Central Conn. and Yale belong in the Lapchick Tournament with St. John's.

Parting Shots.

Michigan is nowhere near the Fab Five teams of years past, and Steve Fisher is another case of good recruiter-bad coach ... Indiana was mistakenly left off my Preseason Top 25. Good mistake ... Ohio U. is very similar to the Massachusetts team which made the Sweet Sixteen — one star, tough defense and a great coach.

Track relies on experience

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

> "The strength of this team is that we have very few weaknesses."
> –Men's track and field Coach Ken O'Brien

A rather confident statement? Yes, but by no means an inacorrect one.

O'Brien is entering his 29th season as head coach of the University of Massachusetts men's track and field team, a squad that he has high hopes for, and rightfully so.

Not only is O'Brien retaining some solid veterans from last year's successful campaign (14-8 overall), but his recruiting season has been equally impressive.

"One of the positives of this team is our class distribution," O'Brien said. "We may not have that superstar competitor that a lot of other teams do, but that can be overcome with a lot of hard work. We're a very deep squad. I'm definitely looking forward to this season."

Actually, the Minutemen are already 2-1, as they defeated UNH and BU and lost to Yale in an introductory quad-meet at BU this past Saturday.

The sprinting events are currently without last year's leading scorer for the Minutemen, senior Lyonel Benjamin. He is rehabilitating his knee problems, however, and is expected back relatively soon.

John Johnson, a senior, and freshmen Scott Price and Michael Tessicini are all threats in the 55-meter dash.

Ronald Tauro, the team's third leading scorer last season, is the leading high hurdler for UMass, and is supported by Christen Conner and Brandon Tutt.

The freshman phenom Price has asserted himself as the club's fastest runner in the 200-meter dash. The speedy Tessicini and sophomore Christian Abbott also participate in the event.

"We have some real good balance in the middle distance," O'Brien said. "In the shorter middle distance especially, we're a young group, but not bashful."

Aptly named Frank Swift, a sophomore, freshman David Cahill and sophomore Terrence O'Neill are best in the 400- meter dash. In the 800, four freshman and Swift are major contributors. Some of the main newcomers include Corey Cameron, Brian Chabot, Tutt, and Michael Merchand.

"Those freshmen, along with Christen Conner, impressed me in the fall workouts," O'Brien said.

Freshman Andrew King, sophomore Walter Stock and junior Ethan Nedeau all run the mile. Nedeau and Stock finished No.-5 and No. 7 in the mile last year, respectively.

Rick Copley, last year's No. 4 scorer, Mike Maceiko, the No. 1 cross country runner, sophomore Paul Blodorn, freshman Ryan Carrara and junior Patrick Murphy all run long distance, and are expected to do well.

The jumping events boast several returnees, including senior captain Thomas Galligani, last year's New England champion in the triple jump. The versatile Johnson is tops in the long jump, with freshman Jeff Brusso currently his backup. Tauro is UMass' main man in the high jump, and the sophomore also competes in the triple jump.

The pole vaulters feature a "strong cast," according to O'Brien. Jim Leary, a junior, and Jason Wojciechowdki, a senior, lead the way here.

"The jumping events could be pretty strong for us," O'Brien said. "Again, the depth is there."

The number one thrower for UMass is Marc LeFebvre. The team's second leading scorer last season, LeFebvre finished fifth in New England. LeFebvre's best throw in the shot put is 50-feet-5-inches.

Junior Bob Dalton is the No. 1 weight thrower for the Minutemen. Reliable Scott Smith backs up both LeFebvre and Dalton.

"I expect a finish of somewhere around 7-3," O'Brien said, "and hope to finish in the top five in the Atlantic 10 and in the top five in New England. West Virginia will be the hands down favorite in the A-10, and Rutgers and URI will also be tough. Our depth, balance and competitiveness should get us far."

Briefs: Jose Canseco headed to Boston?

BOSTON (AP) - The Boston Red Sox and the Texas Rangers reportedly are trying to reach a deal that would bring slugger Jose Canseco to Boston for center fielder Otis Nixon and a pitcher.

The deal apparently hangs on what pitcher the Red Sox would send and the Rangers would accept, The Boston Globe said yesterday. The Rangers reportedly are interested in Ken Ryan, but Boston does not want to part with him and leans toward giving up Gar Finnvold, Nate Minchey or Tim VanEgmond.

Red Sox manager Kevin Kennedy wants Canseco as a designated hitter.

Canseco is 30 and hit .282 with 31 homes runs, 90 runs batted in and 15 stolen bases in 111 games last season.

Nixon will be 36.

He hit .274 and stole 42 bases in 103 games last season.

Final Four to stay on CBS

NEW YORK (AP) - CBS Sports and the NCAA signed a deal that will keep the Final Four on CBS through the year 2002 as part of a package costing the network $1.725 billion.

In a joint announcement made today, CBS and the NCAA said the deal replaces a seven-year, $1 billion deal that was to have run through 1997.

The deal includes all of the men's basketball tournament as well as other NCAA events.

The $1.725 billion represents the largest single price tag ever placed on a TV sports rights deal, breaking the previous record of $1.58 billion that Fox paid to take the NFC away from CBS in 1993. Covering eight seasons, including this one, the new CBS-NCAA deal is worth more than $215 million per year. Fox's NFL deal was for four years, averaging about $395 million per year.

Since losing the NFC last December, CBS has acquired rights to SEC football and basketball, Big East football, the Fiesta, Orange and Cotton bowls, the Army-Navy game, and the 1998 Nagano Winter Olympics.

In addition, the network has extended its contracts with Big Ten basketball and the PGA Tour, signing a four-year deal through 1998, and it has created boxing and figure skating series for its Saturday "Eye On Sports" shows.

Aikman to return this weekend

IRVING, Texas (AP) - The Dallas Cowboys won their last two games without Troy Aikman. It appears they'll get a chance to win the next one with him.

Aikman missed two games with a sprained left knee, but was in charge of the team Tuesday as the Cowboys prepared for Saturday's game against Cleveland in Texas Stadium.

Smith prof. links genes to intelligence

■ Author Seymour Itzkoff draws criticism for views of lower class

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Living poor means that one has few material possessions, but living in poverty is a condition of the mind, according to Seymour Itzkoff, a Smith College professor of education and child study.

Itzkoff's new book, The Decline of Intelligence in America has brought him into a national debate on whether genes determine intelligence.

Itzkoff believes that they do.

"We've created a whole class of people who can't extricate themselves out of poverty," Itzkoff said.

In Itzkoff's book he suggests resolving this problem by shifting birth rates from low-income groups to upper economic and social groups. Because of unproportionate numbers of minorities in poverty, this resolution has brought up questions concerning reproduction of race.

Students have rallied to protest Itzkoff's book, and in the process, have accused him of being racist, Itzkoff said.

Smith College held a forum Tuesday night to discuss the issues addressed in Itzkoff's book, but Itzkoff refused to attend, according to Stacey Schmeidel, spokesperson for Smith College. Itzkoff, who has researched this issue for over 20 years, felt possible protesters could take away from the seriousness of the topic.

A panel comprised of three Smith college professors, two from the psychology department and one from the department of biological sciences, carried out the forum without Itzkoff's attendance.

Psychology professor Jill De Villiers discussed the flaws presenting theories on intelligence based purely on IQ test results.

IQ tests cannot test for creativity, common sense or other elements not directly associated with academic testing, De Villiers said. IQ scores can also change and fluctuate throughout different periods in one's life, making them an unreliable source of data.

"The real issue is the extent where variance in intelligence can be related to variation in genes," said Robert Merritt, professor of biological sciences who spoke at the forum.

There is no question that intelligence is based on genes, because any efforts that have ever been made to change or alter people's environments have flopped, Itzkoff said in a previous interview.

Genetic memories are shaped by evolution in a process where the genes are developed and shaped by the environment, psychology professor Peter Poufall said.

Race was not the primary focus of the forum, but there were grumblings of the implications of race in Itzkoff's theories.

Itzkoff said he is not racist and his theories do not condemn one particular race; but he said he does feel it necessary to look at the history of race.

SC prof. among 3 authors correlating class and IQ

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Seymour Itzkoff's new book The Decline of Intelligence in America has been lumped together as one of three books that could dramatically alter public policy legislation in the future.

The other two books, The Bell Curve and Race, Evolution and Behavior, discuss the same basic issue of environmental and genetic factors determining intelligence.

All three books speak of a growing underclass and the dangers involved in such an expansion of the lower class, bringing forth the idea that intelligence is an inherited trait.

The books all warn that upon reproduction of groups with less-intelligent genes, the nation as a whole could suffer tremendously, and could lead to welfare dependency, poverty, crime and the death of the American dream.

The Bell Curve: Intelligence and Class Structure in American Life, by Richard J. Herrnstein and Charles Murray, says that the decline in IQ test scores and the distribution of cognitive abilities will result in the decline of the United States' ability to compete in the international market.

But the authors' biggest concerns are with the growing tensions between ethnic groups, that result from the majority of the expanding lower class being Black. They warn that if accommodations between ethnic groups are not made, there is great probability for racial hatred.

In Race, Evolution and Behavior: A Life History Perspective, author J. Philippe Rushton writes different races developed in different ways because of

Former UMass coach is remembered

Lacrosse legend Richard F. Garber, age 66, died Tuesday

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Former University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse Coach Richard F. Garber died after a long illness at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton Tuesday at the age of 66.

Garber helped found the lacrosse program in 1955. Despite offers from more prestigious programs, Garber remained at Massachusetts for 36 seasons, compiling a 300-142-3 record. He is only the ninth lacrosse coach in NCAA history to record 300 victories.

Garber graduated from Springfield College in 1950 with a degree in physical education, and received his Masters Degree in education from Penn State a year later.

In addition to being the lacrosse coach, Garber also served as a teacher in the physical education and sports studies programs. He received the Distinguished Teachers Award in 1969, the same year his lacrosse team went undefeated.

Garber was named National Coach of the Year in 1969 and 1976, and the New England Coach of the Year 14 times.

He was inducted into the Lacrosse Hall of Fame in 1985.

Two years after his retirement in 1990, Garber was honored, when Upper Boyden Field, the home field of men's lacrosse renamed Richard F. Garber Field.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Richard F. Garber

While most of the athletic teams at UMass are known as the Minutemen, UMass lacrosse has been widely known as Garber's Gorillas.

"He was a great coach, and a great man," said current Massachusetts Coach Greg Cannella. "Everyone who met him liked and respected him. He's going to be missed."

His wife Mary Jane died in 1992. He leaves a son, two daughters, and seven grandchildren.

Calling hours are tomorrow at the Douglass Funeral Home from 2 to 4 p.m. and 6 to 8 p.m.

Funeral services will be held at Grace Episcopal Church at 2 p.m. on Saturday. Garber will be buried at the Wildwood Cemetery in Arpherst.

Video explores date rape backlash and media hype

By Laura Schmidt
Collegian Staff

A video documentary dealing with the current media coverage of "rape hype" was shown to a classroom of about 30 people in Machmer Hall yesterday afternoon.

Sut Jhally, professor of communication and producer of the documentary, The Date Rape Backlash: Media and the Denial of Rape said he composed the film primarily because he wanted to explore the subject of date rape.

Jhally said that his second intention was to create something which would be regarded as a resource piece that people could use in their field of work, specifically in the communication department.

According to the 55-minute documentary, between the years of 1987 to 1991, great media attention was given to rape as being an epidemic.

The documentary contained discussion among authors regarding the rape hype situation.

A central player in the belief that rape is an epidemic was Katie Roiphe, a graduate student of Princeton University, and author of The Morning After.

It wasn't until Roiphe's book was released that the media really began to analyze "rape hype."

According to the video, upon the release of The Morning After, CNN and "Good Morning America" featured pieces concerning date rape as an epidemic.

"Saturday Night Live" even composed a game show skit titled "Is It Date Rape?" Some of the categories were called "Kegger," "Halter Top," " I Paid For Dinner," and "Raging Kegger."

According to the video, Roiphe attacked a statistic that one out of every four women are sexually assaulted; the number was compiled by Mary Koss, a psychologist from the University of Arizona.

Footnotes from Roiphie's book indicated that she did not refer to

Fees may rise next fiscal year for activity fund

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts might see an increase in the Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF) next year.

The Undergraduate Student Senate passed a motion last night to increase the SATF fee by 7.5 percent for the next fiscal year. The SATF fee, which helps pay for co-curricular student activities, will increase by $3.15 per semester.

Currently the SATF fee is $48 per semester for services which provide services such as free UMass men's basketball tickets, according to chair of the ways and means committee Ruth Malkin.

The SATF fee has not increased in the last 12 fiscal years while the cost of living and inflation has risen, according to Malkin who presented the motion to the Senate.

"Costs have gone up while our funds have not increased to match that," Malkin said. "It's almost like a decrease."

Had the SATF fee been raised according to inflation during these 12 years, it would be more than the proposed amount, according to Malkin.

"The motion will increase the SATF fee more than the cost of inflation for the next fiscal year, which is hardly enough to compensate for all the years that it has not gone up," Malkin said.

The SATF fee increase is also needed to balance the budget, which currently is in deficit, said Malkin.

According information compiled by the University regarding the Projection for Level Funding for the Fiscal Year 1996, the University budget will be in deficit by approximately $119,250.

Malkin stressed these figures are not "written in stone," and are merely projections. Nonetheless, she says that without an increase in the SATF fee the University will not come close to balancing the budget.

"If the SATF does not increase, the budget cannot be balanced unless the University shuts down some student services or cuts back a signifiant amount of programming," Malkin said. "This could translate into the loss of jobs."

Because the Senate passed the motion, the University will be able to maintain its level of programming for such student services as the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority, free student legal services, the student radio station (WMUA) and the Office of Third World Affairs, said Malkin.

"This motion is one of the best things the Senate has done," said Matt Pavesi, former undergraduate student speaker. "The fee goes to student groups, to help them train students to be leaders."

Five College AIDS quilt provides a forum for students

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The "Beyond the Names" AIDS quilt is being displayed through Dec. 15 at University Health Services.

The quilt, created by the Five Colleges AIDS/STD Task Force in the 1992-1993 school year, is acompilation of 8 1/2 inch by 8 1/2 inch square messages encouraging people to practice safer sex, to remember those who have died, and to educate themselves about AIDS.

"We wanted to create a vehicle for students to express what it's like for them to grow up in the HIV era, whether they've lost someone or not," said Debra Edelman of Health Education at the University of Massachusetts. "It's not necessary to lose someone to have feelings about AIDS. It affects students in many ways."

•The Five-College AIDS quilt is on display at the University Health Services Until Dec. 15.
•The quilt consists of messages encouraging people to practice safer sex, remember those who have died from AIDS, and increase awareness in the fight against HIV.

Edelman said the project is not meant to compete with the Names Project AIDS memorial quilt, which preserves the memory of AIDS victims across the U.S.

Students used donated cloth, fabric markers, buttons, yarn, glitter, paper, and other materials to create small squares for the quilts expressing how AIDS has affected their beliefs and ideas about health care, sexuality, the political process, and the future.

The squares include the names of friends who have died and the names of celebrities who have contracted HIV and AIDS. The names include Ryan White, the southern teenaged hemophiliac who was barred from school because he had AIDS, and Magic Johnson, the NBA basketball player who contracted HIV.

"No one is living without AIDS," said one patch. "You are no different then they were," said another.

The project was funded by a $1,000 grant from the American College Health Association. The project also received contributions from Serv-U Hardware Homecenter of Northampton, The Textile Company of Greenfield, Home Fabric Mills of Belchertown, the Family Planning Council of Western Massachusetts, A.J. Hastings, Ames Department Store of Greenfield, and Polymark Fabric Paint.

"Condoms ruin your sex life, wait till you see what HIV can do," said one patch.

Koss' article in the process of writing her book.

Koss set up an analogy as a response.

She said if a person denies being an alcoholic, yet they show characteristics of an alcoholic, such as drinking to get rid of a hangover, does society turn them away?

Koss says society should help, because the characteristics are a sign that the person is an alcoholic, just like a woman's word should at least be a characteristic in the claim of sexual assault.

"Women who suffer from attacks aren't statistics, they are real. We must keep fighting for rights, respect and security for girls and women in the country," said Susan Douglas, author of Where The Girls Are.

"The media makes us think that so many women are vengeful," said Carrie Skinner, a UMass student.

"The subjects of sexual assault, date rape and 'rape hype' are real problems. The film reflects my view of the subject," said Jhally.

Are there negative stereotypes towards female strippers? If so, where do you think they come from?

Compiled by Tim White • Photos by Julio A. Cordero

"Yeah, mostly from other women. [The stereotype is] they're degrading their own body, not improving the status of women as whole in the country. I don't think there's anything wrong with [strippers], it's their body."
–Todd Numan
senior, forestry
Westborough

"I definitely think there's a stereotype. It comes from society's negative attitude towards the sex industry. People have a lot of preconceived ideas about women who choose that kind of work, and they might not understand the socio– economic pressures that causes women to go into that work."
–Caroline Nina Rago
Hampshire College
senior

"Yeah, I think there is. Women that strip in a club are seen as having low self-esteem and they can't do anything else. That probably started with a lot of feminists. I don't necessarily think it's true because I know a lot of women who do it because of money problems."
–Kristen Roundtree
senior, journalism
North Attleborough

"Yeah there is. I guess they're being seen as objects. It comes from all the exploitation and how society depicts them. I don't agree with the stereotype. It's sort of wrong, they're humans like us, they shouldn't be exploited physically like that."
–Simon Koo
freshman, School of Management
Acton

"Yeah, I would definitely say there is a negative stereotype. [The stereotype is] they're desperate women where their only way for income is selling their bodies and exploiting themselves. I think that's an unrealistic view point, some people are stuck, but not everyone's in that situation."
–Monette Russell–Ward
senior, women studies
New York City

"Yes, I think it's looked down upon by other women because it's a form of exposing their bodies to males, and women are supposed to be very feminine. Personally, I think a woman could do whatever she wants; I wouldn't do it."
–Hollie Sarrazin
freshman, undecided
Colchester, Vt.

"Yeah, [the stereotype is] they are stupid, and their bodies are the only thing they can use, I don't know any female strippers to base that opinion on, so I don't know. But I don't think you can make generalizations at all, everything is individual."
–Todd Markham

different climates and environments. This led to physical and reproductive differences, including brain size, which effects intelligence levels.

Rushton wrote that people who evolved in hot and unpredictable climates, like in Africa, became more fertile and reproduced at higher rates than those who evolved in colder environments farther north, who had fewer children but invested greater amounts of time in nurturing them.

The Decline of Intelligence in America: A strategy for National Renewal, by Itzkoff, speaks about the correlation between genetics and intelligence, rendering intelligence levels hereditary.

Itzkoff promoted birth control for the underclass and elimination of illegal immigration.

All three books give a grim picture of the future of the United States and offer the same basic solution — have the most intelligent and affluent individuals reproduce and prohibit those with lower IQ scores from reproducing.

and the validity of the "survival of the fittest" theory.

"During the ice ages, 30,000 years ago, northeastern Asians were behind in brain structure," Itzkoff said. "The Neanderthals destroyed them and started a civilization."

Now, 30,000 years later, the Japanese are one of the most technologically-advanced countries in the world, Itzkoff said.

These examples should be used as models to increase the productivity and intelligence of the United States, Itzkoff said.

"Unlike The Bell Curve, my theories view the racial issue as insignificant," Itzkoff said. "Intelligence does not carry a racial flag — it is neutral. Any race can reshape itself to be the most intelligent."

Itzkoff, who considers himself an egalitarian Marxist, feels society and its educational system create class barriers which exploit people.

"There is a map of experience — you must become functional in a highly–abstract society," Itzkoff said. "You must be able to comprehend symbols, ideas and concepts."

Itzkoff, born and raised in a working class family in Brooklyn, New York, has done seven books on this topic and researched it for 18 years, while teaching at Smith College since 1965.

An evening on the brink

What are the limits of tolerance?

Many of us find ourselves tested daily, pushed by some individual or practice, forced by a sense of civility to swallow our true sentiments and smile the most plastic of smiles.

But sometimes, there are instances that can't be dismissed as minor annoyances. Someone or something has violated us to the point where reason or self-control may not be an option. We cannot compromise our values.

In those cases, we may or may not find ourselves thinking, "Should I hold back?" Of course, in such an enraged state, what would cutting loose entail?

Chris Taylor Conner

A few weekends ago, I was pushed to that self-revealing brink.

The time was about 11 p.m. on a Saturday evening. In my efforts to get a little taste of campus life, I accompanied a friend of mine to a fraternity party. I knew beforehand the frat only had about half a Black brother in its predominantly White ranks, but I didn't consider it an issue. Without trying to appear self-righteous, I'm generally comfortable with anyone who's comfortable with me.

I wasn't prepared for the conversation I was about to have with "Joe."

Joe's name is in quotes above because he was so heavily intoxicated that he could not coherently say much; thus, I had to create a name for him for this piece.

I first noticed Joe, beer from his cup sloshing about, swaggering over to me soon after I arrived at the party.

"What are you doing here?" he asked, after I had asked him to repeat the horribly slurred phrase at least three times: "Who do you know here?"

The first push.

As I told him I was with a friend who knew many of the brothers, I noticed what he was wearing: Notre Dame hat, sweatshirt emblazoned with "IRISH" in bold green letters across the front.

Normally, I wouldn't have even taken note of the clothing; I don't harbor any prejudices against the Irish, so why would Joe's nationality matter? Yes, combined with the line of questioning, I knew there might be trouble brewing.

After completing his initial interrogation, Joe explained that because he believed I was Jamaican because of my dreads, he feared I might be a drug dealer, like the Jamaicans he claims terrorize his hometown of Dorchester (although, in an ironic note, Joe admitted to having dealt drugs himself on occasion).

The second push.

By this time, I was wondering why I was still listening to this drunken little imp. Maybe I just wanted to see if he would overstep that boundary, drop the pretenses, and just say it.

And then, he did.

Joe, with some odd expression I believe was intended to convey integrity, ceremoniously informed that he was a racist, and that he would have no qualms about starting a fight with me if I had come to cause trouble.

The third and final push.

There, swaying right in front of me, was that situation we never quite imagine: Joe had managed to touch upon that sensitive core, different for everyone, within us all.

So, why did I still continue to talk to him, when instant gratification probably would have been gained by assaulting him?

Subconsciously, I may have restrained myself because numbers overwhelmingly favored Joe. However, my thoughts at the time did not revolve around the beating I might take.

I figured, Maybe if I can't change him by examining the nature of his beliefs, at least I can make him think.

Yes, my reaction, trying to get to the root of his anger, was perhaps idealistic and unrealistic. But I know that I exercised more tolerance that night than I ever have.

Maybe even too much.

Maybe that daily testing leaves us a bit number every day, our willingness to accept hostility rather than civility leaving us largely unprepared for extreme situations.

And when that trying day arrives, maybe all we can do is trust in our good judgment, and should that run out, as mine almost did in dealing with Joe, trust our deeper instincts.

Letters to the Editor

Martin lecture produces outrage

To the editor:

I am writing to express the outrage I felt during the lecture by Professor Anthony Martin. To put it simply, this program was no different from a Nazi rally in the 1940s. Some of the statements were that anti-Semitism has lost all its meaning because Jews call almost every Black leader anti-Semitic, the Jews founded the NAACP and then spied on them to report the information to the government, Hillel organizations across the country engage in the Jewish conspiracy to oppress Black students, and that Jews controlled a majority of the slave trade. These are just a few comments made by Professor Martin which led to the Black students to give him several standing ovations as well as heckling approval to most of his remarks. One of the comments that anti-Semitism has lost all its meaning is extremely offensive and what would people think if I said racism has lost all its meaning and Blacks are no longer oppressed.

Anyone can watch a tape of the speech themselves if you don't believe the severity of the allegations Tony Martin made towards Jews. As a few at UMass, I feel threatened. These events have contributed to a sense of harassment and intimidation on campus. What other events need to occur before this campus stands up and puts it foot down on the vicious anti-Semitism that has been propagating for the last three years. Does a Jewish student need to be attacked or killed to finally to finally make this campus take anti-Semitism as a real issue? This is the question I propose to those organizations that sponsored Tony Martin's lecture and one I demand to be answered.

This speech by Tony Martin was 100 times more severe than Farrakhan, Jeffries or Sharpton. A bigoted speech like Tony Martin's would not be allowed if he were attacking any other minority group, but for Jews as much hatred as possible can be incited. Since Phi Beta Sigma and other sponsoring organizations have allowed this lynching of Jewish students to occur, this campus must take steps to ensure that this event will never happen again.

Coach is not praised by all

To the editor:

I recently picked up the December copy of the Maroon and White and was astonished to see the byline "Strength and Conditioning: Coach Bob Otrando draws praise from every corner of the UMass athletic department." I have been working out in the varsity weight room and acquainted with the athletic department for over a year and have heard quite the opposite, so I quickly turned to read of this "praise."

The article chronicled Bob Otrando's work history from the age of eight, which was used as evidence that Bob works very hard, and cited quotes from only two sources in the athletic department: football personell and Elaine Sortino, the UMass softball coach and associate athletic director. Both parties sang the praises of Bob, saying that he "works as hard as anyone I've ever seen. He does it for everyone," and that the softball girls...flat out love him."

These quotes certainly sound like praise, but there is another side to the story which manifests itself in many ways. First, I do want to agree with Mike Hodges that Coach Otrando works very hard. In fact, I've yet to see another Division I school who allows the entire Strength and Conditioning Department be left to only one individual. As a result, part of the reason Bob works so hard is because he refuses to allow any other knowledgeable individuals to work with him.

A case in point was the graduate assistant in the Strength and Conditioning department from 1992-1994, Jane Taylor, who is a certified Strength and Conditioning Specialist. Under Kevin Fulton and Gina LaMandre, Ms. Taylor was allowed to design programs for individual teams, follow the implementation of such programs, and be primarily responsible for certain items. In her second year, under Bob Otrando, she was stripped of all responsibility and reduced to a weight room monitor. Of the staff currently working in Weight Room #1 under Coach Otrando, only one has professional certification and there are no female strength coaches.

Second, I must disagree with Coach Hodges that Bob's treatment of female athletes or male athletes in "minority" or Olympic sports is equivalent to the treatment given football. The only team with a specific bulletin board for their program and nutritional notes is football. The impressive chart documenting individuals with the records in various lifts if for football alone.

If Coach Otrando doesn't have the time to do this for all the teams, a plausible reality given all he does for football, he needs to be willing to hire individuals who are capable of sharing his load.

I feel the University community needs to hear the other side of the story, that only two corners of the athletic department praise Coach Otrando. Those two corners have distinct reasons to praise. The rest of the corners, aside form football and softball, were not represented in the story and may have quite a different story to tell.

Friends are the bread of life

Erin Barnes

A few weeks ago, I participated in a most interesting experiment; an experiment many of you may want to consider. A friend and co-worker asked to interview me for her sociology class as to why friendships end. Upon accepting her offer, I found myself actually trying to prepare for my inevitable interview; what would I say, who would I talk about, etc.

When the day finally arrived, my moment in tape- recorder history was quickly transformed into that of a therapy session. Since then, I have been very thankful and reflective towards the exercise, as well as extremely appreciative to the quasi-counselor who helped to facilitate it. Not only was this experiment cleansing in the sense that it provided me with a neutral listener, but the timeliness of such an activity produced in me a new, almost urgent, awareness about those closest to my heart.

My conversation generally centered around two friends, both of whom I have grown apart from in one way or the other. The first is a high school best friend and former college roommate whose interests have taken her in a different direction, both geographically and physiologically. I found this transformation difficult to come to terms with because for many years, she and I were one in the same. Our only difference was hair color, or so I thought. This is not to imply that either of our "directions" is better than the other, but for a long time, I assumed we would be traveling down the same path. In a sense, our friendship has never ended, it has expanded to new heights. We have both found success and happiness in our present situations. My only regret is that our paths do not cross more often.

Similarly, I have these same feelings with another friend who is much closer to home. Again, our friendship has not ended, yet there is something about it that doesn't feel as good as it used to. Our mutual friends agree that, two years ago, this gentleman and I were inseparable.

In fact, many of them figured he and I were dating because of the amount of time we spent together (of course, they realize the humor of that idea now). While our viewpoints varied, our interests were alike. We would see movies to take our minds off the unending hours of homework, or drive to Boston at a moments notice. We would even hang out at the mall if we couldn't find anything else to do!

Sadly, for reasons outside of my control, I spent the next year in Colorado, trying to keep in touch as best I could. I had high hopes for my return, figuring our friendship would, for the most part, simply pick-up from where it left off. Alas, for fear of sounding redundant, I have realized that our lives are also heading in different directions. The flexibility to do the things we did freshmen year just isn't there anymore. Our academic workload has, of course, increased significantly. Plus, our romantic situations have changed roles. He is happily in love with a wonderful woman, while I have yet to find Mr. Right (although I'm having fun looking). Again, not to say that his status is superior to mine, yet they are rightly different. Most importantly, he and I are not the people we were two years ago. I honestly miss how things used to be, and I hope that our lines of communication open before it is too late.

It seems as though this semester, and all its ups and downs, has passed us by in a hurry. It hit me the other day how I have a mere three semesters left at UMass, should I chose to go home or venture elsewhere after graduation. It is because of this fact that I have placed such urgency in realizing the value of my friends.

Without question, we all have our differences, yet we are all alike in that we care very much about one another. I don't want graduation to come and go without these people knowing how special they are to me. It's not too late for those of you who want to do the same. Grab a sociology major, or anyone else who will listen for that matter, talk to them, and find a new awareness about something we have known all along: friends truly are the bread of life.

World turns back on Bosnia

Thomas E. Akyali

British Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd suggested this week that if a Bosnian peace accord cannot be reached in the near future, the United Nations may consider pulling out all peacekeeping troops. Hurd also indicated that the arms embargo on the Bosnian Muslims might soon be lifted, enabling the parties involved to "fight it out" with more ammunition.

Apparently, the world is finally ready to turn its back on the Bosnian conflict. By allowing free flow of arms to the Bosnian Muslims, the United Nations will set the stage for a final climactic blood bath, a series of battles in which the losing side will be mercilessly massacred.

The tragedy here is that pure warfare, not diplomacy, seems to be the only realistic means by which the fighting may eventually end. The Serbian capture of 402 peacekeepers as hostages has tied NATO's hands, preventing bombing of Serbian strongholds. Serbian leader Redovan Karadzic has declared that the Serb Nation must be either "recognized or destroyed." The complete destruction of one side appears to be, tragically, the only method by which the fighting will stop. The United Nations lifting of the arms embargo will certainly expedite this process.

Over the past three years in Bosnia, uncounted lives have been lost. Serbian forces have followed through on their horrific policy of ethnic cleansing. Refugees describe the systematic rape of Bosnian Muslim women by their Serb captors. After giving birth, the women are murdered and the children raised as Serbs. The crimes are committed under the eye of the United Nations and NATO, in the presence of peacekeeping troops and European diplomats.

Bosnia represents the ultimate failure of our world governing agencies. Until this week, the United Nations and United States had maintained that the peace might be reached diplomatic processes. After three years of failure, they are now prepared to rearm the warring parties so they can more effectively destroy each other, providing the solution diplomacy cannot.

When this war ends, we will hear accounts of war crimes and atrocities rivalling the horrors of the Holocaust. Once again, we will ask ourselves how this could happen; how we have allowed hundreds of thousands of Bosnian Muslims to be summarily executed.

Only 50 years have passed since the end of World War II, but the United States and her allies seem to have very selective memories. In Kuwait, George Bush preached liberation. There is no oil in Bosnia, so Bill Clinton harps on diplomacy and negotiation.

The diplomats who hoped, two years ago, that compromise might bring peace to Bosnia, could not have been expected to predict what the war would turn in to. Nevertheless, they might have looked to recent history for guidance. As the Vietnam war proved, a halfhearted dedication to any military cause can only bring chaos, and will never serve to more swiftly end the fighting.

In retrospect, an early military operation by NATO, to paralyze all aggressor forces, might have paid dividends by sparing hundreds of thousands of lives. It is of course too easy to make policy in hindsight.

The tragedy of Bosnia will soon become a part of history. The United Nations and United States must learn from this catastrophe that there exists no easy solution to such deep rooted hatred. As the Kuwaiti situation illustrated, an early stage. Our diplomats and peacekeepers could not have been expected to realize this three years ago. Hopefully, we will apply in the future the lessons that Vietnam, Kuwait and now Bosnia have so tragically taught us.

Solving some TV mysteries

By Tracy Gavel
Collegian Staff

There's something that's been bothering me for a couple of months — maybe someone out there could help me out. Why do we really need to have a "New Price is Right" when the old one is still on the air? Especially since the "New Price" is so cheap-looking, with a smarmy young host who looks like self-absorbed playboy Kirk from "Dear John."

What's the deal? I mean, are they getting ready for when veteran host Bob Barker gets 'called out of contestants row,' so to speak? He must be totally insulted — first he's accused of being a dirty uld man, and now his employers are hovering like vultures just waiting for Bob to croak so they can slip that 'Kirk' guy in his place and hope that nobody notices.

I noticed that the networks have been pretty lazy about putting on anything good this week. Apparently they're all out of breath from exerting themselves during the November sweeps. Basically there's been a lot of reruns and a couple of so-so looking movies to choose from.

NBC rebroadcast the original Beverly Hills Cop the other day, and it's so hard to believe that nobody cares about Eddie Murphy anymore when not too long ago he was such hot stuff. I kept a sharp eye out for then-unknown television stars Paul Reiser, Bronson Pinchot and Damon Wayans, who all had bit parts in the film.

Actually, I didn't even realize at first that Wayans played the guy whose banana got stuck in the

STRIPPERS SPEAK OUT ON SEXUALITY, EMPOWERMENT & WHY THEY DANCE

BY EMILY MARINO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Editor's Note: This article is based on the interviews of women from only two clubs, the Race Street Pub and the Magic Lantern. Other clubs that were contacted did not return the Collegian's calls. The owner of Anthony's refused to allow access to the dancers who work there.

"Absolutely No Contact Between Dancers and Patrons," reads the sign on the front entrance door of the Race Street Pub in Holyoke. Similar signs can be found on doors of clubs throughout the local area that feature exotic and nude dancing by women.

Inside the club, the Race Street set-up resembles that of many area strip clubs. A bar sits around a corner, not far from the front door, with tables close by and in separate rooms, accompanied by plush seats. In the other direction is a series of lighted, shiny wooden bars and stools. The bars connect to each other and double as a stage, and the patrons sit just higher than eye-level to the stage floor, as with a fashion show runway.

Depending upon the time of day and day of the week, there can be anywhere from one to nine women dancing on the stage at Race Street. In most clubs, the women dance nude or in costumes whose lives on stage are short-lived, or designed to reveal various body parts with certain dance moves.

A dancer might remain in the center of the stage, dancing or incorporating into her routine the poles which run from the ceiling to the stage floor, and are away from the customers. It is common for a dancer to approach one customer at the bar at a time, to perform in close proximity and possibly chat — for a tip.

"Talking to people shows them that each girl is different, and that we are real people, not pin-up dolls," said Anna, who attended Hampshire College for one semester and has been dancing in the area since February.

In a typical club, each dancer is assigned a bouncer, to make sure that when she is dancing close to one particular customer, she is not touched or assaulted in any way. The dancers are also escorted to their cars at night, after work, and watched by bouncers or other staff as they drive away from the club.

"A strip bar is one of the only safe places for a woman to display her sexuality," said Jasmine, a dancer who is "21 going on 40," and the mother of a two-year-old. "I feel much more safe up there [on stage] than I do going to the corner store."

Almost all of the dancers interviewed who have worked for more than a year said that they have been touched only one or two times by patrons who were immediately removed from the club.

"People know they did something wrong, generally," said Aimee, who is a senior at the University of Massachusetts with a 3.88 grade point average and a dancer of two years. She recalled that the one man who did break the "no contact" rule with her was escorted out of the club without problem.

Many of the women interviewed said that they encountered inaccurate stereotypes regarding the nature of their work.

Dancers at both Race Street and the Magic Lantern in Palmer said that despite the strict "no contact" rules and the measures taken by managers and bouncers to enforce them, many people who have never been to a strip club still think that their job does not stop with dancing.

"You know why you came in here," said Aimee, "to see naked girls and tip them, and that's it."

As for the idea that dancers date or sexually pursue customers, all of the women interviewed said that their jobs were just that — work.

"I don't go out with customers," said Hailey, who started dancing at the age of 20, and has been at the Magic Lantern for three years. "That's the first rule you make." Although she said that the bar has a "homey" atmosphere with regulars who have become friends during the time she has danced there, "It's just a job."

"We do have another life," said Jasmine. "This is a job like any other job, we do get sick of coming here. When I go home I am a mom," she said, and explained that plans to start school soon at a local college further added to her responsibilities.

"By acting and looking a certain way, you become a sexual woman," Anna said, explaining that a person's sexuality is different once they step into the world of the stripper.

Many of the dancers said their profession is not accepted by all the people in their lives. Many of them said their boyfriends are not happy with their dancing.

"If you really care about somebody you're not going to want them to do this," said Hailey, whose boyfriend "can't wait" until she stops

Seasonal tunes, culinary treats make for joyous holiday celebrating

Famous voices lend talent and festivity to Christmas releases

THE CHRISTMAS ALBUM, VOL. II
Neil Diamond
Columbia

After listening to Neil Diamond's new Christmas collection I began to wonder: when, exactly, did Diamond become a parody of himself? In his quest to attain the mythic "cool" status like other aging crooners such as Tony Bennett and Tom Jones, Diamond has tried to be "hip" and remain the swingin' lounge singer that he is. Unlike Bennett and Jones, however, Diamond is not succeeding too well.

Like most current artists doing Christmas albums, Diamond puts a different spin on familiar old chestnuts instead of just singing the damn songs. Diamond adds faux gospel and wailing guitars to "Joy to the World," a squeaky- clean anthem redi-made for a sitcom montage tit's something that could easily show up on "Full House" — you know, with Jesse jamming for the nth time with the Beach Boys in a special X-Mas episode).

The lowlight of this dubious attempt at re-visioning old standards is an unintentionally hilarious rendition of "Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer." Grooving to a dopey reggae beat. Diamond tells all his boy and girl listeners to see the "Rudolph" story as a parable for individuality and overcoming peer pressure — all the while adding more "dig it!"s than are legally allowed.

The album is not a total waste of time, however. Apart from being a quite successful comedy debut for Mr. Diamond, his robust voice is used to full effect in his uncluttered versions of "Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas" and "I'll Be Home For Christmas."

Most of the other tracks, though, especially but not limited to the lesser-known holiday tunes, all come in two varieties: the overblown epic ("Angels We Have Heard on High," "Hallelujah Chorus") and the wispy ballad ("Mary's Little Boy Child"). The latter category also claims the eerie distinction of all sounding like that old Kermit the Frog hit, "The Rainbow Connection." Let me be the first to say it's pretty sad when the best you can do is sound like a green sock puppet. C (Jon Lupo)

SO THIS IS CHRISTMAS
Various Artists
Atlantic Records

If there was ever a case to be made for the view that female performers in music are under-appreciated and underrated, the Atlantic compilation So This Is Christmas is definitive proof.

Of the eight songs on this collection of Christmas offerings, only three of the tracks are really worth listening to, and they are all contributed by women.

Victoria Williams' voice is the perfect match for "Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas," Tori Amos is, as usual, brimming with emotion on "Little Drummer Boy" and Juliana Hatfield's "Make it Home" is enough to make you want to remember holidays past and have a good cry. This song isn't even really a Christmas song, and it still outshines all the other tracks on the album. This says something.

Both versions of "Silent Night" are worth skipping. The first is by Bad Religion, which pretty much says it all, and the Evan (why won't he just stay in the Lemonheads) Dando version has all the emotion of a monologue by Mr. Spock. Other forgettable contributors include Hootie and The Blowfish, Daniel Johnston (and tugh) Collective Soul doing "Blue Christmas." Elvis must be rolling over in his grave.

The women are the only thing saving this one. C– (Mike MacLean)

SNOWFALL: THE TONY BENNETT CHRISTMAS ALBUM
Tony Bennett
Columbia Records

Sometime during the course of 1994 someone, somewhere decided that Tony Bennett was a happening guy (probably his publicist). Suddenly before you could hum the tune to "Stepping Out," the toe-tapping crooner was everywhere, being hailed as the new lovable fave of those nutty Gen X'rs.

Thankfully, this new found hip status hasn't had much of effect on Bennett since his latest album Snowfall: The Tony Bennett Christmas Album is an exquisite tribute to the holiday season — the old fashioned way.

No trendy rocking rewrites of Christmas standards here folks, just quaint renditions of holiday favorites that drip with that gooey yuletide sentiment that everyone just loves.

No need to be ashamed, though. Mr. Bennett is a master at the art of tugging on the old heart strings, and on Snowfall his plan of attack is downright vicious.

Accompanied throughout by lush amounts of strings, horns and woodwinds, Bennett suavely swaggers through 11 holiday treats, some classics, some less known, with a voice that just makes you feel warm all over. You have to hand it to him — he may be getting old, but the guy can still sing with the best of them.

Bennett manages to take such tiresome tunes as "My Favorite Things" and "Santa Claus Is Comin' To Town," and amazingly revives them with some spiffy jazz arrangements. On other songs such as "The Christmas Song" and "White Christmas," Bennett wisely takes the conservative path, singing along overblown string arrangements and angelic flutes.

There are a few miscalculations, though, such as Bennett's medley of Christmas standards which includes, among others, "Jingle Bells," "We Wish You A Merry Christmas" and "Where Is Love." Throughout the medley Bennett's voice is either overshadowed by an unbearably hammy choir or forced to carry the whole song such as on "Silent Night" (stick to the swinging numbers, Tony).

With Snowfall Bennett has created the most pleasurable and traditional of the season's usual barrage of Christmas CDs. Listening to the album immediately conjures up hundreds of holiday cliches, from roaring fireplaces to soft white blankets of snow — and in the end isn't that what Christmas music is all about? A– (Matt Audette)

CHRISTMAS SPIRIT
Donna Summer
Mercury

The season for spirit-second comebacks and everyone is jumping on the holiday bandwagon hawking their tidings of peace, love and their emergence from obscurity. Best known for her '80s hit "She Works Hard for the Money," Donna Summer has released her tribute to holiday commercialism: Christmas Spirit.

Surprisingly enough, Summer abandons her cheesy '80s persona to produce a very traditional sounding album. Complete with angelic choirs and tinkling bells, Summer's voice is somber and heartfelt, as if auditioning for a part in the church choir. She has talent and the songs prove that beneath her glitter interior, she also has soul.

The best songs are "O Holy Night" (minus a rather long ending where Summer "jams" with the gospel choir), "O Come All Ye Faithful" and "White Christmas." They all sound crisp, clear and precise with no attempts to "modernize" them with wailing guitars or ludicrous dance beats.

Of course there is some cheesy stuff. The narration at the beginning of "Breath of Heaven" is a bit overblown and sounds a lot like a love sick ballad Whitney Houston might have nixed from her debut album.

"Lamb of God" is also a little off the beaten track. A sample line goes something like: "Harrod was an evil king/ killed the babies/ tried to alter God's holy plan." The lyrics are then punctuated by (sigh) an electric guitar and some overwhelming instruments that's reminiscent of Nelson's glory days (brief as they were).

On the whole, Summer's album leaves you well within the spirit of Christmas with songs that you might here at some office party and hum to at the local super market. B+ (Tara MK Connelly)

MERRY CHRISTMAS
Mariah Carey
Columbia

Maybe it was the red skin tight cat suit trimmed in white fur that threw me off or the perky, "come here big boy" look in Mariah's eyes that graced the cover. Either way something didn't sit right with Carey's Merry Chrismas.

Like her voice, the album is very big sounding: grandiose vocals, booming background singers and seven real, live reindeers with a sleigh on the inside cover. However, there is such a thing as going overboard and Carey captured that element perfectly (her voice can open a garage door, for chrisakes!).

"Silent Night" opens the album on a quite traditional sounding note and then suddenly launches into "All I Want for Christmas Is You." Except it's a version no one has ever heard before. It's bouncy and jazzy and sounds like a track that got cut from A Very Special Christmas, but didn't quite fit. Other tracks that followed the same overbaked sound.

"Joy to the World" and "Jesus Born On This Day" are monstrosities complete with a sappy children's choir and booming symphony orchestra as if Carey wanted to make the sequel to "We are the World" with just her.

Three quick, easy yuletide eats aim for your sweet tooth

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Besides the massive commercialization and the plethora of overwrought television specials from omniscient figures like Kathie Lee Gifford and Perry Como (please!), the Christmas season is best known for one thing.

FOOD!

Yes, as soon as Turkey Day is finished, we all obtain the license to throw out whatever diet we claim to be on and totally pig out, truly making gluttons of ourselves. No matter what social-religious persuasion you come from, the festivities celebrated in everything from office to family parties make room for delicacies of all kinds to be shared.

But when it comes to the college atmosphere, either lack of knowledge of food preparation or resources hinders the student from fully taking advantage of this joyous season's full culinary experience. Admit it — the best food you eat all year is at home on the holidays.

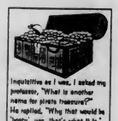
So, in my mission to make Christmas cooking as user- friendly as possible, I have compiled a short list of easy recipes from my catalogue of sweet, epicurean delights to please the palate. In my home country of Finland, the baking done in the kitchen — and its recipes — is highly guarded and personal, so at this point I am giving you pieces of my soul.

Take them and tempt your honey, or impress those people that are oh-so important in your life. As they say "Merry Christmas" in Finnish, Hyvaa Joulua!

St. Nick's Picks (preheat oven to 350 degrees)
1/2 cup butter/margarine, softened
1 1/2 cups firmly packed brown sugar
1 egg
1 teaspoon vanilla extract
1 1/2 cups all-purpose flour
1 1/2 teaspoons baking powder
1/4 teaspoon salt
1 cup raisins
1 cup chopped walnuts
• Grease cookie sheets. In large mixing bowl, combine butter, brown sugar, egg and vanilla, then beat until fluffy and light. Stir in flour, baking powder and salt, mix well. Stir in raisins and walnuts. Drop tablespoonfuls onto greased cookie sheets, and bake in upper third of 350 degree oven for 10 to 12 minutes. Remove from cookie sheets, and cool on plate or wire rack. Makes three dozen cookies.

Chocolate Chip Pie (preheat oven to 325 degrees)
2 eggs
1/2 cup flour
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 cup brown sugar
1 1/2 sticks butter, softened
1 cup chopped pecans/macadamia nuts
1 cup chocolate chips
1 nine-inch unbaked, pre–prepared pie shell
• In large mixing bowl, beat eggs with mixer at high speed for three minutes, or until foamy. Beat in flour, sugar and brown sugar until well blended, then beat in softened butter. Stir in nuts and chocolate chips, and pour into pie shell. Bake 45 minutes in a 325 degree oven, or until knife inserted in middle comes out clean and top is golden brown.

Berry–Walnut Upside–Down Cake (preheat oven to 325 degrees)
2 cups blueberries/cranberries/raspberries
1/2 cup chopped walnuts
1 1/2 cup sugar
2 eggs
1 cup flour
1 stick butter, melted
1/2 cup confectioner's sugar
• Grease eight inch cake tin and spread berries on bottom. Sprinkle with chopped walnuts, and cover this layer with 1/2 cup of the total amount of sugar. In mixing bowl, beat two eggs and then add the remaining one cup of sugar, mix well. Then gradually add flour, alternating with melted butter. Mix well, and pour over berry–nut layer. Bake one hour and 10 minutes in 325 degree oven. Cool and remove from pan by placing plate/dish on top of pan, and turning the pan over. Sprinkle with confectioner's sugar.



Inquisitive as I was, I asked my professor, "What is another name for pirate treasure?"
He replied, "Why that would be booty, yar, that's what it is."

Eclectic WAR promise to stir up funk

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

As many people now know, perhaps from watching the news, listening to rap music, or talking to people from the area, there is war in the Compton part of Los Angeles. This area in fact is from where WAR, a large soul/funk/Latin/rock fusion band, arose.

WAR will bring their eclectic brand of funk to the Pearl Street stage tomorrow.

This is the band that sang the somewhat well–known song in the Richard Linklater film, Dazed And Confused called "Low Rider," a big No. 1 R&B hit (No. 6 on the pop charts) from 1975. The song "Why Can't We Be Friends?" from the album of that title was in the same movie, as well as on the same album as "Low Rider." Their songs have also been featured in movies like Mi Vida Loca and Colors.

The band has its roots in keyboardist/vocalist Lonnie Jordan, drummer/vocalist Harold Brown and guitarist/vocalist Ronnie Scott's high school years. The first two members that were to join forces were Brown and original saxophonist Charles Miller (who left the band in 1979), who met when Brown was practicing drums in his Long Beach, Calif. home. Miller just happened to be walking by and heard him.

Eventually, the two recruited other members such as Jordan, Scott, late bassist Pete Rosen (who died in 1969), and late percussionist Papa Dee Allen. They went on to form the bands The Night Shift and The Creators, an earlier R&B cover band with different members. The Night Shift impressed the late Eric Burdon (of Animals fame) and harmonica player Lee Oskar. These two joined up with the Night Shift, who changed their name to WAR to jokingly contradict the "peace" message on the streets.

Oskar joined full time, but Burdon left after two amazing albums, Eric Burdon Declares "WAR" (1970) and "The Black Man's Burdon" (1971). After these two albums, and after Burdon left, the band released the No. 1 album of 1973, The World Is A Ghetto. It was all uphill from there.

With all original members gone except for Scott, Jordan and Brown, and a new album, Peace Sign, the band is still rumored to go on long jams that range from blues to Latin to rock to funk, like they were famed for in their prime days of the 1970s.

Coincidentally, WAR are large advocates for pacifism all over. Just listen to the Latin funk of "Why Can't We Be Friends?" and it makes you want to put aside your differences and hang out with your worst enemies, to get to really know them. WAR is for full peace and will not accept any alternative.

"At first [the name] was taken negatively since war is conflict," said drummer Harold Brown. "But war starts with inner conflict. If you can conquer war up there, then you will have peace."

WAR will play Pearl Street Dec. 9. The show is 18+. Contact Pearl Street for more information.

dancing. Hailey said that she and her boyfriend broke up for a while when she was performing private shows, like bachelor and birthday parties. According to Hailey, these shows are more dangerous situations for women to get into, because they often go to private homes without a bouncer.

Renee, a 23–year–old Hampshire College drop–out who has been dancing at the Race Street Pub for five months said she selectively tells the people in her life that she is a stripper because she said many of them will not understand or accept her for it.

"There are some people who don't know because they would have a hard time relating to me," she said.

Melanie, who attends a division of Northeastern University in Boston and has a 3.95 grade point average, said that while her sister knows she is a stripper and supports her, her parents and most other people in her life do not. Melanie travels from over an hour away to dance in Palmer, because she said that it is harder to dance for people she knows.

"Nobody [at home] knows I take my clothes off to pay the bills," said Melanie.

Though a common stereotype the strippers encounter is that they are exploited by the industry, many say that the feeling they get from dancing is one of empowerment.

Renee said there is no question in her mind who is in control when she is dancing.

"I don't feel exploited because I am in complete control, I am in so much control because I can get really close and they [the patrons] can't touch me," she said. "I feel very powerful. In a way I am manipulating them to give me money so I can live."

Melanie said that she feels empowered on stage, and that generally "it's the only thing that you're really in control of, your sexuality." She said the exploitation of women is present in all areas of American culture, and thrives on the fact that society is hung up on sex and afraid of the naked body.

"I think women in general are exploited just because of the way they look," said Melanie. "You can't take it too seriously, or you will lose your sense of humor."

The money factor is a reason why many of the women said they dance. Rain, a 23–year–old dancer who has been dancing for three years said she makes at least $1,000 a week. Renee said she makes between $400 and $800 per week — almost all of the money coming from tips. At the Race Street Pub, the dancers make their own schedule.

Hailey said that stripping was ideal for single mothers and students because of the flexible hours and the amount of money the dancers earn. Hailey said on average, she makes $800 to $1200 a week from her salary and tips.

Most of the women agreed that stripping is not a job for everyone. Hailey, who "started late for the business," said that she had to get over her own misconceptions about strippers before she auditioned three years ago. Now, at age 31, she said she knows, "We're not all perfect."

Renee said it took her a little while to feel comfortable dancing. She said she was nervous when she started, and she had trouble making eye contact with the customers.

> "I don't feel exploited because I am in complete control. I am in so much control because I can get really close and they can't touch me. I feel very powerful."

But she said she was studying modern dance at Hampshire College and believes stripping is just another form of dance.

Feeling comfortable with their bodies is important to dancers. Renee said she was lucky because as a six–foot thin woman she had a good body. However, the dancers at Race Street Pub are not required to maintain a certain weight or look a certain way. They create their own costumes and make their own routines.

Rain said she has a body image problem that she has worked to overcome in the years she has danced. But she said she knows it does not matter how she looks; she can still dance.

"There are all different kinds of bodies like there are different kinds of women. That doesn't mean you have to be a stereotype [to dance]," she said.

Rain said she is quitting after three years of dancing and is looking into bartending.

"It's just not fun anymore," she said. "It is a creative job; creating fantasy — I'm starting to lose the edge."

Fantasy is part of the dance, according to many of the dancers.

"There has got to be an outlet for people's sexual frustration and fantasy," said Aimee, who explained that being comfortable with her body had a lot to do with her ability to dance nude.

"I was always a naked little kid running around the house. I would be degrading myself only if I didn't want to do this," Aimee said.

People and Pop Culture in the News

Well, Cindy Crawford and Richard Gere have denied a divorce is in the future, but like Kevin Costner and the other Cindy, these have proven false. Jean Claude Van Damme cannot deny divorce rumors — he's getting one from wife number four after nine bliss-less months. Also headed to splitsville is humorist Dave Barry and his wife.

What is it with rich and powerful people's insatiable need to obtain even more wealth and power? Well Jeffrey Katzenberg, David Geffen and Steven Spielberg have formed a nameless production company that plans to join forces with Capital Cities/ABC to create programming for network, cable and syndicated TV.

Bountiful "Baywatch" actress Pamela Anderson is filing a $12 million libel suit against the tabloid The Globe saying the paper's statement that she was a heroin addict injured her job. Another person getting sued for libel is MTV VJ Kennedy. She allegedly sneaked a peak at photo of two young women and called them whores. The ladies are now suing Viacom, MTV's mother company for a cool $20 million. Plus, if you're wondering if Kennedy has a last name...it's Montgomery.

If you missed Roseanne on "Saturday Night Live" you might have also missed her announcing her in-vitro fertilization. Apparently she had the procedure done using the sperm from her fiance/bodyguard Ben Thomas.

A new movie have just hit video store shelves— Oblivion, starring George Takei, a.i.a. "Star Trek's" Mr. Sulu. It's about a Western mining town set in the year 3031 with the antagonist being a big gun toting— lizard. Also keep an eye out for Carel Struychen, Lurch from the Addams Family movies.

If you liked the Client then you'll be glad to hear that it's being made into a TV series by CBS and Warner Bros. But don't worry, John Grisham is personally making sure it stays true to his words and is working the shows consultant.

Some people just let stardom get to their heads. New super villain Malcolm McDowell, from the "Star Trek" movie Generations is having a tiff with Paramount. Why? Well, the actor reported failed to show upon "Good Morning America" to promote the movie. Apparently the studio refused to pay for the Concorde flight following his promo appearance.

What could possibly happen on "Melrose Place" to get its viewers even more hooked? How about adding Jasmine Guy to battle Heather Locklear's character, Amanda for control of D&D Advertising? And maybe for extra panache they'll throw in ex-porn star Traci Lords so Sidney can have a friend. Or maybe they'll throw together goody goodies Jake and Jane...who knows?

Editors' Cuts

Book — Deception

As the semester winds down and brain cells turn to mush, it's nice to be able to pick up a book that isn't reading for a class. In fact, fluff suddenly sounds nice and relaxing.

Amanda Quick's latest release, Deception is a book that fits the aforementioned requirements. Fast reading, good action and substantial plots that involve mystery and some suspense. Quick makes for good reading.

Quick's heroines aren't melting forms of female flesh easily swept away by some macho man on a white horse. In fact, if anything they are smart, intelligent and witty. Rest assured, it a problem arose they'd jump on their own damn horse.

In this book, Olympia Wingfield is a scholar of ancient myths and legends trying to decipher a century-old diary containing information on a hidden treasure. Jared Chillhurst is the hero whose family is linked to the treasure. He must find away to get the diary from Wingfield and win her confidence so she can decipher it for him. Give it a chance.

— Tara MK Connelly

Music — The Beatles

It's Beatlemania all over again. This week the fab four made a return to the record shelves with Live at the BBC, a two disc set that features 56 unreleased tracks that have been collecting dust in some vault.

The songs were selected out of a possible 288 tracks that had been recorded for a BBC radio program from 1962 to 1965. And while the songs are somewhat simplistic, since they were not remastered or touched up, they do provide an excellent glimpse into the band before all the hype.

The tracks on the two discs range from unreleased Lennon/McCartney collaborations to covers of the band's favorite artists such as Chuck Berry, Little Richard, Buddy Holly and Carl Perkins.

The songs are all still presented in all their mono glory and give a previously unheard raw edge to the lads from Liverpool.

Already, the album has created a buying frenzy in England (the album sold out of its pre-shipped 300,000 copies) and has been shipped platinum in the U.S..

— Matt Audette

Concert — Indigo Girls

Returning to the Valley for the third time in two years, the folk pop duo known as Indigo Girls are playing at the Mullins Center, tomorrow at 8 p.m. to promote their most recent album, Swamp Ophelia.

Made up of singer-songwriters Amy Ray and Emily Saliers, Indigo Girls are well-known as pioneers of neo-folk pop tunes, merging honest, heartfelt lyrics with intricate arrangements and/or a simple acoustic strumming. Ever since their label debut in 1988 with Indigo Girls, the pair has steadily increased their fame as well as their near-rabid fan base.

Featuring appearances by R.E.M., Indigo Girls was followed up by 1990's Nomads'Indians'Saints, whose first single, "Hammer and a Nail" was nominated for a Grammy, 1992's Rites of Passage and the current release, Swamp Ophelia.

Known for their intimate and intense concert appearances, Indigo Girls are up against the enormous Mullins Center, but if their past performances are any indication, it won't matter too much — the songs will still ring true.

tailpipe — believe me, the scene was a lot less memorable than it sounds. The movie did have a really great soundtrack, though.

Anyway, I once again attempted to watch ABC's much-acclaimed "NYPD Blue," but I don't know what's wrong with me — I just can't seem to get into it. Maybe it's an acquired taste. And I also decided to try out FOX's "The George Carlin Show." Last week's episode featured Carlin spreading around this strange bacterial disease that caused all of his friends to sprout gratuitous tufts of hair in highly peculiar places.

After that nauseating experience, I decided that I've had my fill of macho comedies for the rest of the century. Oh, and on a totally irrelevant note, I'm happy to report that I've finally memorized the entire "Fresh Prince of Bel Air" theme song. At last I can join in with the rest of America and sing along with the popular sitcom's opening credits.

Suddenly, I feel a bit less nerdy.

Also last week, I discovered a pretty cool syndicated show called "High Tide." It's a shameless rip-off of "Baywatch" featuring shapely young women in bikinis as background scenery, and starring washed-up singer turned bad actor Rick Springfield. Rick-boy spent most of the hour solving various crimes and trying not to get upstaged by his vibrantly-colored floral print shirts.

There was one really terrific scene, when it looks like Rick's nitwit younger brother has been pushed over a steep precipice to his death, but then suddenly bro comes back just in time to save Springfield's life. Astonished, Rick-boy says, "Brother, I thought you went over the cliff!" to which modest baby bro replies "Naw, I live on the edge!"

It was the funniest, absolute goofiest exchange I'd heard all year. Any series that has the guts to include that sort of dialogue is definitely worth checking out.

On a more positive note, I was pleasantly surprised by NBC's "Cosby Mysteries." I feared the Cos would be hamming it up all over the place, making silly gestures with his fello snacks in hand — but he was actually refreshingly mellow. I think getting away from comedy for awhile will be good for him.

Oh, and I almost forgot — there's something else that's been bothering me lately. The thing is, I still haven't been able to figure out why I really like Richard Mulligan, when I can barely tolerate his NBC series "Empty Nest." I just can't figure it out — television can be so mind-boggling. But I guess some TV mysteries are never meant to be solved.

Lauded documentary captures hope, struggle & Hoop Dreams

By John Horn
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — It's a scene you've seen in dozens of Hollywood movies: a street corner, several shadowy characters, a furtive exchange of cash. The only difference in this film's drug deal is that it's not played for the cameras.

It's real life.

The transaction is one of many memorable and often devastating moments that take the new documentary Hoop Dreams beyond the basketball courts on which much of the movie takes place.

In following the lives of two talented high school players over nearly five years, Hoop Dreams unfolds as a compelling document about sport, family, inner-city life and undying hope. Like the drug deal conducted by one player's father, the movie plays like a contemporary urban novel — a multilayered drama filled with unexpected turns.

"We tried to write grants. We tried to get people to understand what we were after," Steve James, one of the three Hoop Dreams filmmakers, says about the struggle to finance and produce the $320,000 movie.

"It wasn't just about the thrill of victory and the agony of defeat. But there was a sense that this was not a serious enough subject of inquiry. People didn't get it. That's changed some."

Indeed, it has.

The winner of an audience award at this year's Sundance Film Festival, Hoop Dreams recently became the first documentary to close the New York Film Festival.Despite a nearly three-hour running time, Hoop Dreams has received enthusiastic reviews nationwide, including notices from publications like Newsweek that usually ignore nonfiction film. If it is popular, Hoop Dreams may help abolish the notion that documentaries are stiff, bland discourses as exciting as migrating geese.

"There are a lot of our peers on the sidelines who are really cheering for this film and really cheering for the whole documentary endeavor: That a film can come out and can be successful, that it can be perceived as dramatic and not medicine, as entertainment," James says.

Fine Line Features, the Hoop Dreams distributor, is releasing the film slowly so its critical momentum can build. Rather than marketing the movie as a sports story, Fine Line is positioning Hoop Dreams as a dramatic, true-life tale: more Schindler's List than Hoosiers.

The company hopes the film can even attract Oscar nominations beyond the documentary category — anywhere from editing to best picture.

But there is one ominous sign: Turner Pictures, a branch of Fine Line's parent company, is developing a fictionalized feature film based on Hoop Dreams. The clear implication is that the documentary isn't enough, that a screenwriter (Ralph Wiley) needs to give this story an overhaul.

Although Hoop Dreams ostensibly follows Chicago high school stars Arthur Agee and William Gates as they pursue dreams of the National Basketball Association, the film is populated with a supporting cast of surprisingly open characters who give the movie its depth:

• Curtis Gates, William's brother, who invests his own dashed basketball aspirations in his younger sibling's future. Unable to hold even a menial job for more than a few months, Curtis may be the film's most tragic figure.

• Arthur "Bo" Agee, Arthur's father, who fights a cocaine addiction and a wavering commitment to his family throughout the film. "I don't want Arthur to experience the bad things in life I went through," he tells the filmmakers. Not too much later, as his son practices his jump shot, Bo buys drugs as Arthur (and the audience) watches.

• Gene Pingatore, the St. Joseph basketball coach, who is Chicago's high school answer to pro football's Mike Ditka — heartless and insincere. Players who don't excel are discarded, and he tells one player seeking advice about his family, "Write 'em off." Pingatore and his school have sued the film's makers and distributor for defamation, but they have hung themselves on the coach's own whistle.

Launched in 1986 as a short film about street basketball, Hoop Dreams very rapidly became a locomotive pulling a much longer story train. In the first days of videotaping, James and partners Fred Marx and Peter Gilbert found both Agee and Gates and witnessed the unusual spectacle of a high school recruiting elementary school students.

"For me, that was the biggest hook: You have this adult telling a 14-year-old inner city kid, 'You remain in here, and I'm going to help you get into college.' You just saw these families' faces light up," says Gilbert. "The first week of filming that we did, and I was hooked."

For the next 4 1/2 years, the trio followed Agee and Gates, taping more than 250 hours in gyms, classrooms and the players' homes. (It took more than two years to edit it all together and the videotape was then transferred to film).

As Agee and Gates improved on the courts, their circumstances deteriorated. One player injured his knee. Another's family couldn't pay its electric bill as cold winds swirled outside. For the filmmakers, it was all painful to witness — but great movie material.

The filmmakers helped pay the Agees' power bill, but largely stepped away from helping Arthur in his academic struggles. Says James: "There are some people who say that to be really good at this kind of documentary filmmaking, you have to be outthroat with what goes on — you have to keep filming, and keep getting it — whatever it is.

With antiseptic tracks, Pearl Jam's latest delivers a boorish, uninteresting journey

By Mike MacLean

VITALOGY
Pearl Jam
Epic Records

It would be a stretch to say that this album would be something that one would come to expect from Pearl Jam. Right down to the extraneous packaging, Vitalogy comes off as more than just a little pretentious.

Pearl Jam has been to the '90s what Boston was to the '70s — a great arena rock band, churning out catchy guitar- driven rock songs with solos that have kids everywhere reaching for their air guitars. The problem with Vitalogy is that more than half of the songs sound like they could have been written by those same junior high kids who idolize them.

Not to say that there aren't some great tracks on this album. "Not For You," which the band performed on their Vs. tour, is a stab at all the poseurs and bandwagon jumpers, taking shots at them with lyrics like "Smell my table/seats just two/got so crowded/can't make room."

"Tremor Christ" and "Nothingman" follow "Not For You," providing the longest section of music where one doesn't feel compelled to hit the skip button. Unfortunately, that's the largest chunk of worthy cuts out of all 14.

It's difficult to believe that the same group who gave us such classics as "Alive" and "Daughter" and even some lesser known songs such as "Yellow Ledbedder" and "Alone" would create such abominations as "Spin The Black Circle" and "Whipping."

"Better Man" tries really hard to be "Daughter II," with its ballad feel, but doesn't quite measure up to the intensity of the most popular cut off Vs. Other songs (and it's a stretch to call them that) like "Bugs," "Pry, To," and "Hey Foxymophandlemama. That's Me" are nothing more than throw-away tracks.

"Bugs" and "Pry, To" are basically just two-minute goof- off sessions with inane lyrics, a lot of background noise and one constant, annoying chord throughout each song.

The last track, "Hey Foxymop..." or "Stupid Mop" as it's called on the disk itself, is an exercise in futility. The "song" is nothing more than a free form drum pounding over which tapes of a troubled child's therapy sessions have been sped up and slowed down.

The CD booklet uses entries from an old medical book, made to seem like they have some deep meaning by taking them out of context. But in the end, much like the songs on Vitalogy, these attempts at rock philosophy come off as probably the most self-important release by anyone this year.

What is the band's fascination with childhood trauma? After about two minutes of this, one's major concern wouldn't be about tortured youth, but about how fast they can get to the CD player to hurl the disk across the room.

And this pretty much sums up the problems with this album — too much stuff that no one wants to listen to. The riffs are dull and yet repeated until your ears are begging for mercy, while the lyrics take a step back into a pseudo- prophetic realm that is most exemplified by the lyrics in "Bugs." Like the lyrics in "Rats" from Vs., Vedder tries to relay a serious view of social behavior by using a weak analogy to an animal (or insect).

Eddie, get a clue, it came off as silly in Vs., it's only going to get worse.

Thankfully they didn't print the lyrics to "Bugs;" it would have been just as much a waste of paper as the entire booklet.

The CD booklet uses entries from an old medical book, made to seem like they have some deep meaning by taking them out of context. But in the end, much like the songs on Vitalogy, these attempts at rock philosophy come off as probably the most self-important release by anyone this year. C-

When Carey isn't over-singing the traditional carols of old, however, she can handle the more contemporary tunes like "Christmas (Baby Please Come Home)." She almost manages to pull off "Santa Claus Is Coming to Town," but that's only because she's mostly drowned out by a gospel choir with bigger lung capacity.

"Merry Christmas" is nice for those who live for extended remixes and dance versions, but it isn't something you can warble to with friends and families. This is a bummer because carols were meant for groups—a not a singer with pitches only Spot can hear. Carey should have saved her commercial appeal for her next epic album and left the caroling to us. C (Tara MK Connelly) number of offensive rebounds (27) pulled down by the intense Minutemen.

I was pleased with a lot of things, especially on offensive rebounds," Calipari said. "Against Kansas (an 81–75 loss on Dec. 3), we didn't get to the glass with that intensity. That is a key for us, and we did it tonight."

Turnovers also had much to do with the 28-point victory. The Panthers, who had as many turnovers as they had points in the first half (17) on their way to a game total of 27, were lit up for 39 points off the mishaps.

The turnovers instigated the 15–4 run capitalized by a Roe jumper that made it 28–15 with 7:18 to go in the first half. From there on in, the Massachusetts lead never got any lower.

"We ran into a team that is physically stronger than we are," said Pittsburgh coach Ralph Willard. "The key stats of the basketball game was obviously the offensive rebounding. 27 for UMass, and we also had 27 turnovers. They scored 39 points off the turnovers, which is just a staggering statistic."

"We wanted to take it to them, try to get to them to turn the ball over some," Calipari said. "I thought we did a good job in that regard."

With the utilization of 15 players, and with six players seeing more than 20 minutes of action, the substitution system used by Massachusetts last night against Pittsburgh kept the players fresh. And since the Minutemen were able to shuffle players in and out, they became more valuable than the six players who carried the load for the Panthers.

"What they do is when they get tired, they come out, and when we get real good, they put themselves back in," Calipari said. "If you watch us closely, that's how we play. Because I let them understand that this is their team, don't be selfish and stay on the floor when they're tired."

"UMass is very deep," Willard said. "That's the key to their basketball team, they're extremely deep, they just keep throwing people at you."

The freshmen saw some play on the hardwood. Andre Burks and Inus Norville, playing in their first regular-season game at the Mullins Center, each played 11 minutes, giving the starters a needed breather.

As for Roe, was he happy with the fact that he didn't have to play 35 minutes like he did in the Kansas game?

"Definitely," Roe said. "I was happy for the other guys. On the way down to the tournament and Final Four, we're going to need everybody to play in the games."

the NCAA which proposes a minimum of forty men's gymnastics teams for a national championship competition, the team is organizing a petition to the organization in the form of a campaign for a yes vote to a proposal in the January 1995 convention.

The athletic director at Temple University has recommended termination of the men's and women's gymnastics and baseball programs after this season for reasons of a need for space and budgetary concerns. The coaches and gymnasts of Temple University were urging people to contact the administration at the university to oppose this action.

UMass will be in a similar situation concerning the dropping of men's gymnastics for the 1995–96 season if the NCAA keeps Bylaw 18.2.10.1.

never saw him raise his voice at a player. That's unheard of in athletics.

"He taught [us] to enjoy the pursuit. He didn't care if you won or lost as long as you tried your best."

Garber will be buried Saturday in Wildwood Cemetery in Amherst. On April 11, 1992, the Stadium once known as Upper Boyden Field was renamed Richard F. Garber Field in honor of the man that built the program from nothing.

"He is the program," Millon said. "He cared so much and so deeply about it. He built it. UMass lacrosse was everything to him. It was everything to him. It was his wife, his family and UMass lacrosse."

The official mascot is the Minuteman, but during the spring on "the hill," UMass lacrosse will always be Garber's Gorillas.

Strong guard play earns Minutemen victory

Williams leads way with six assists

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

On the strength of strong play by the guards and excellent offensive rebounding, the No. 5 University of Massachusetts men's basketball team pounded Pittsburgh 85-57 in their home opener last night in front of a sold out crowd at the William D. Mullins Center.

Lou Roe and Mike Williams led the way for the Minutemen, as the two seniors each had 13 points. Roe had his fourth straight game with over 10 rebounds, grabbing 12 on the night. Williams was perfect from behind the three-point arc scoring nine of his 13 from outside. Williams, who is often criticized for shooting the ball to often, led UMass with six assists.

Massachusetts	85
Pittsburgh	57

Massachusetts Coach John Calipari was pleased with the play of his senior guard.

"People will look at Mike Williams and say he shot the ball, and he did," Calipari said. "The biggest thing was he made everyone on the floor better. He played hard and made everybody better."

Against Arkansas, the Minutemen dominated the boards, which led to the upset of the Razorbacks. A week later against Kansas, the Jayhawks won the rebounding battle, and consequently the game. Last night, Massachusetts owned the glass out rebounding Pitt 51-28.

"The biggest thing was our offensive rebounding," Calipari said. "That is a key for us. Against Kansas we didn't get to the glass."

The Panthers came into the game considerably undermanned with would-be starters Jerry McCullough and Chris Gant sidelined. The Minutemen pressed early, and forced Pitt into turnovers and exhaustion.

The Massachusetts defense forced the Panthers into committing 17 first-half turnovers and 27 overall. To make matters worse for Pittsburgh, the Minutemen blocked 11 shots, led by five from specialist Marcus Camby.

"We wanted to take it to them and get them to turn the ball over. I thought we did a good job in that regard," said Calipari, who reverted back to man-man defense at halftime. "In the second half, we didn't press as much because of the score.

"I've been on both sides of this fence where we've gone on the road and gotten beaten by 30. I didn't want to try to go out and run up any score. We just don't play that way here."

In the first five minutes, it looked like Pittsburgh was going to give the Minutemen a battle, keeping the score even at 9-9 with 14:45 to go in the first half. But Massachusetts put the game out of reach early, outscoring the Panthers 33-8 to give UMass a 25-point lead at halftime.

Just two days before, the Panthers erased a 23-point St. John's halftime lead, and ended up only losing by five. But the Minutemen did not let up, and the Panthers did not have the strength for another comeback.

"We were dead tired," Willard said. "We were tired in practice yesterday and we only had one day of preparation for the game."

The Minutemen extended the lead to 34 points early in the second half before letting up to keep the score from ballooning even further.

"UMass is clearly one of the top five teams in the nation. UMass is very deep. We don't have the depth or the athletes to play with UMass right now," said Pittsburgh Coach Ralph Willard. "Every time I look down the bench it's like 'Here we go again.'"

Chad Varga was one of the few bright spots for the Panthers with 20 points and 12 rebounds. Jason Maine had 17, but most of that came in garbage time at the end.

"You have to look at when he [Maile] gets them," Willard said. "We need him to get them when the game is still in the woodwork."

Willard was pleased with the way his team handled Roe, though. Roe entered the game averaging 33.5 points a game.

"We did an excellent job on Roe," Willard said. "We took him completely out of the game."

The margin of victory allowed Calipari to rest his regulars, (no Minuteman logged more than 27 minutes) and give his bench some playing time.

Andre Burks chipped in four points and three steals, while Tyrone Weeks scored his first points as a Minuteman. The crowd erupted, though, when walk-on guard Jason Germain drained a three-pointer with 48 seconds left to cap the victory.

Game notes: Dana Dingle started in place of Camby, who had missed practice after suffering from the flu. Camby came off the bench and played 20 minutes.

The Mullins Center crowd observed a moment of silence before the game to honor former lacrosse Coach Dick Garber who died on Tuesday.

The Minutemen return to action on Saturday in Baltimore to take on No. 11 Maryland in a rematch of last year's NCAA second round matchup.

Highlights...

The depth of the No. 5 Minutemen was overwhelming as 12 players scored, and all 15 played. The guard play, offensive rebounds and scoring off the Panthers' 27 turnovers were the keys in Massachusetts home-opener win. Shooting guard Mike Williams tied with Lou Roe for a team-high 13 points, and dished out six assists, Roe led the way with seven of the Minutemen's 27 boards, and Massachusetts scored 39 points off of Pittsburgh turnovers. The result? A 28-point beating that could've been worse.

Depth proven in last night's pummeling of Pittsburgh

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

The depth of the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team was exploited in last night's 85-57 victory over Pittsburgh.

While the frontcourt has been the cornerstone of the Minutemen, the backcourt proved its own worth last night, combining for 39 points. The very weak Pittsburgh squad did play the Minuteman frontline pretty tough, as Orlando Antigua (seven points) and Jamie Peterson (6 points) each had four blocks apiece.

The backcourt, however, was the part of the Minutemen that shined last night, especially from long range, as they went 7-12 from three-point land. Mike Williams scored 13 points (including 3-3 from three point land) and dished off a team-high six assists. Edgar Padilla scored 11 points and Derek Kellogg had eight points (2-3 coming off three pointers).

Even Jason Germain got into the long-range action, burying a three-pointer with :14 left in the game.

Shooting the ball is something that has greatly improved from last year, producing more viable weapons for the Minutemen. The shooting was rather poor last year, exposing the strength of the relentless rebounding of the frontcourt. The problem was if the likes of Lou Roe and Co. were stopped, so was the Massachusetts offense.

The Minuteman frontcourt was not exactly dominated by the Panthers in last night's game, as Lou Roe's 13 points and 12 rebounds led the way, while Donta Bright scored 12 points. The Minutemen outrebounded the Panthers, 51-28.

Ex-players recall Garber fondly

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

A coach, a friend, a legend.

The man who could be considered the father of Massachusetts lacrosse, Richard F. Garber, died Tuesday at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton at the age of 66.

Garber leaves behind three children and seven grandchildren. His son Ted replaced him as the Massachusetts lacrosse coach for four seasons. His daughters Mary Ann Martin and Kathy Garber reside in Hightstown, N.J. and Vail, Colo. respectively.

See related story, page 1

His legacy is an impressive one. After starting the lacrosse program at UMass in 1955, Garber compiled a 300-142-3 record in 36 seasons at the helm. He is only the ninth coach in NCAA history to win 300 or more games. Garber retired following the 1990 season as the winningest active coach in the nation.

He led UMass to nine NCAA tournaments and 13 New England Championships. He was named National Coach of the year twice, in 1969 and 1976, and the New England Coach of the Year 14 times. Garber was inducted into the Lacrosse Hall of Fame in 1985.

"The University is on the lacrosse map because of him," said Norm Smith, who played for Garber from 1976 to 1979.

So much of that success came because his players responded to his teaching and coaching.

"Everytime we stepped out on the field, you wanted to win just for him," said former player and All-American Mark Millon.

In addition to his success on the field, Garber was also respected and well-liked off of it, especially by his players.

"He was the kind of person you wanted to be around," Millon said. "He wore so many different hats off the field. He was a friend, a counselor and a father figure."

"Coach Garber absolutely had the biggest impact on my life of anyone I have ever met," Smith said. "He dramatically changed me for the positive. I think that the buttons that he pushed in me, he pushed in a lot of people."

First-year Head Coach Greg Canella, who played under Garber said his former coach would be missed.

"He was a great coach, and a great man," Canella said. "Everyone who ever met him liked and respected him. He's going to be missed."

In an era where many coaches possess a "winning is everything" philosophy, for Garber, his players always came first.

"He taught that winning is a great thing, and that it is important to try to win, but you're not always going to win," Millon said. "[He taught us] to enjoy life. There are always going to be tough times, but things are always going to get better."

"He instilled confidence and a belief in yourself," Smith said. "He had a saying 'If you believe in you, I believe in you.' He was a values-oriented person. I

Goaltending tandem big in HE

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

The goaltending tandem is something of a lost art in professional hockey. It's said that to win in the NHL, a team must have the so-called "true No. 1." And that notion is usually proven on the ice, as the likes of Patrick Roy, Mike Richter and Tom Barasso play eight out of 10 nights so their teams may celebrate Stanley Cup titles.

The Hockey East conference has a wealth of fine netminding, and of its nine teams, two boast tough 1-2 punches between the pipes, while the University of Massachusetts features a trio.

The Minutemen will see one of those dynamic duos this weekend when they travel to the Granite State, whose State U seldom allows a soft goal.

Last season, junior Trent Cavicchi handled the bulk of the duties quite nicely (14-7-1, 2.95 goals against average, .896 save percentage) for Coach Dick Umile, and the Lake Echo, Nova Scotia-native has been solid, though not spectacular this year (4-2, 3.63, .866).

But seniors like to make their final season special, and Mike Heinke is doing just that. Cavicchi's backup last year is relishing his new role, recording 4-1-2 in smooth fashion (2.94, .902). UNH has allowed the fewest goals of any HE team (43 in 13 games) against overall competitors.

This space suggested weeks ago that Boston University, the odd-on favorite to walk away with the conference crown, would feel the heat of at least one challenger.

Sure enough, BU isn't even atop the standings, where the Maine Black Bears are perched with their undefeated mark of 11-0-4 (6-0-4 in HE). But Northeastern checks in third, and their pair of puck stoppers is the best of the bunch.

A NU press release has clever nicknames like Mike "Bud" Veisor, who has been a good friend to his fellow Huskies. The junior draft choice of the St. Louis Blues has been difficult to solve, posting the best save percentage (.905) in league play.

On Veisor's nights off, Todd Reynolds has had trouble picking up victories (2-3-1, 1-2-1 in HE), but not stopping shots. "The Wrapper" only trails his teammate on the save percentage charts (.898).

Hockey East does include three workhorses: Merrimack's Martin Legault, Boston College's Greg Taylor, and Maine's Blair Allison.

The Warriors and Eagles don't appear to be in contention for post-season play, but Coach Shawn Walsh's Black and Blue Crew sure are, and Allison deserves tremendous praise for his contributions to Maine's resurrection.

Walsh knows good goaltending when he sees it; his previous combo of Mike Dunham and Garth Snow took the Black Bears to the 1993 NCAA Championship. Then Dunham made the 1994 U.S. Olympic Team, and Snow has a promising future in the Quebec Nordiques' organization.

At the rate he is going in his junior season, he will earn honors comparable to those of his mentors. Allison's durability knows no limits; he's played every minute of every contest. He has a GAA of 2.85 in 15 total contests, which only jumps to 3.01 in league play. Oh yeah, he hasn't lost.

The league had a chance Wednesday to boost its record versus the ECAC toward the impressive mark it earned last year (30-11-2, .720). HE has taken five straight from its ECAC foes in 1994-95, and UNH went to Harvard last night and Vermont faced off at BU, which welcomed New Jersey Devils' draft pick Jay Pandolfo (2d round, 1993) back to the lineup last week.

Men's gym finish sixth in UMass open

Coach Roy Johnson pleased with his team's opening meet

By Jody King
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team opened its season Saturday at the Curry Hicks Cage in the UMass Open.

The Minutemen finished with an overall 210.95 in the meet to take sixth place in the nine-team field. Placing first for overall team score was Penn State, who scored 224.45 points.

"I was happy by our performance," UMass coach Roy Johnson said. "I think we'll be able to hit our goal later in the season. It was a good opener."

Freshman Kevin Schwartz, a three-time USA Gymnastics national champion, led UMass in his first collegiate meet with a second-place finish on the still rings with a 9.80. Schwartz nailed a beautiful routine with a high level of difficulty to cheers from the crowd of close to 500 friends, families and fans.

"One judge had Kevin at a 9.9," coach Johnson said, "but the other judge talked him down." UMass is expecting Schwartz to perfect his program as the season progresses.

According to co-captain Jay Santos, the team has been performing better in practice than they showed in the Open. With a little more than a month before they compete again, the Minutemen will have a chance to clean up their routines before entering the West Point Open on January 13.

Johnson said finishing with the pommel horse was a factor in the team's score.

"It's tough to go last on the horse," Johnson said. "I think that hurt us, it put us at least five points lower than everyone."

Finishing sixth, but still ahead of Southern Connecticut, MIT and Vermont, the Minutemen saw this as a meet to find out where they were in relation to other teams and to see how well they could compete this early in the season.

"This meet showed us that we need a lot of work. We are throwing some good skills but we need to clean up and hit them," Santos said. "We have worked out better than we competed today, we need to transfer that to the meets."

UMass alumnus Jason Braud did not have the same problem. Braud performed Saturday in his alma mater's Open with precision on the floor exercise. Nailing every landing and incorporating difficult moves, Braud scored a 9.90 in the event.

"I amaze myself. It was a really good set and it felt great," Braud said. "I was very happy, and amazed."

As an open entry in the meet, Braud took first place on the floor for a new career best. Braud currently holds the all-time UMass record on the event with a 9.85.

"It was different without Jay, he was a consistent performer and you could always count on him," Santos said.

Following the meet, the UMass Dance team performed a number on the floor for the crowd. Keeping up the energy level that had been apparent throughout the meet, the dancers showed their spirit and talent.

After the performance, a gymnast from Temple made a plea to the crowd for support of their gymnastics program. Responding to the Bylaw (18.2.10.1) set fourth by

Don't criticize Shaq, Hurley coming back, Dallas led by Jax

Andrew Bryce
On The NBA

To all, you Shaquille O'Neal bashers, I have two words for you.

Shut up.

Ever since Shaquille O'Neal arrived in NBA-land, critics have dogged him for his play, saying that he is one- dimensional, offering that he can't hit an outside shot, claiming that he has no perimeter game.

All of this is absurd. Why in the name of all that's holy would Shaq decide to hang out behind the three-point line when he makes a comfortable living in the low-post, drawing the fouls? Why bother shooting a 20-footer when a three-footer is possible? Shaq absolutely dominates down low, and the short shots are sure shots.

Granted Hakeem Olajawon and David Robinson are a step ahead of him as far as all-around play is concerned, O'Neal is doing pretty well for himself, averaging 31.4 points per game and pulling down 11.3 rpg in his first 14 games (statistics through Sunday, Dec. 4). And his team is doing pretty well themselves, as they sit atop the Atlantic Division with an 11-3 record.

I can't help but think that the Shaq of today must have been the Wilt Chamberlain of yesterday. Physically strong, scores all points from the paint and draws the foul, has trouble at the free throw line (Shaq is at 60 percent, Wilt was widely known for his poor free throw shooting) — and fails to get the proper credit despite dominating his opponent night after night.

For Shaq to follow in the Hall of Famer Wilt's footsteps, he must be doing something right.

• A-ma-zing.

The story of Bobby Hurley is an incredible and inspiring one. A year ago Monday, the Sacramento Kings point guard got into a horrible automobile accident. He was thrown 20 feet from his car, and was retrieved from a drainage ditch with five broken ribs, collapsed lungs, a broken shoulder blade and a partially torn ligament in his right knee.

Just when the thought of living a normal life was questionable, Hurley has made it all the way back to the hardwood. His averages of 5.4 ppg and 5.1 assists in 18.3 minutes per game don't tell the story.

The fact that Bobby Hurley is actually playing the game of basketball once again tells it all.

• How 'bout the Triple J-crew in Dallas? Jimmy Jackson, Jamal Mashburn and Jason Kidd have put up some big numbers for the young Maverick squad, and show some promise. Jackson (29.6 ppg) and Mashburn (24.2 ppg) have each scored 50 points in a game, and the rookie Kidd has a few triple-doubles under his belt.

Playoffs this year? Don't hold your breath, but this is the type of threesome that Dallas can build around for the future.

• There's no truth to the rumor that winless Clipper coach Bill Fitch is changing his name to Phil Bitch.

SGA proposes hike in tuition and fees for Fiscal Year 1996

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

After an 18 month battle with the administration and the state legislature to insure accessibility, students at the University of Massachusetts may see their tuition and fees increase for the Fiscal Year 1996.

A motion was passed Wednesday night by the undergraduate student senate to recommend a 7.5 percent increase in the Student Activities Trust Fund [SATF] fee.

The motion will now go to the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs for recommendation then to Chancellor David K. Scott in order to be voted on by the Board of Trustees, according to student coordinator for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy [SCERA], Lynn Robitaille.

If the Board of Trustees passes the SATF fee increase of $3.15 per semester, tuition and fees may increase depending on next year's budget, according to Student Government Association president Mirran Raphaely.

Raphaely, who has been working with SCERA and the Save our School's campaign to prevent an increase in tuition and fees, says she will be disappointed if the SATF fee increase results in higher costs for students.

"I will be unhappy if tuition and fees increase, but if it is the only way to take the burden off the SATF, we will have to do it," Raphaely said.

The SATF fee, which is currently $42 per semester, helps the University pay for co-curricular activities, such as free men's basketball tickets. The fee has not increased in 12 years, while inflation and the cost of living have risen, according to chair of the ways and means committee Ruth Malkin.

The SATF fee increase is needed to maintain current services and programming, Registered Student Organizations, agencies and the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority, according to Malkin.

The increase would also help balance the University budget, which will be in debt by approximately $119,250, according to Projection Level Funding Expenses for the Fiscal Year 1996. There is a reasonable trade-off for students with the SATF fee increase, according to Raphaely.

"Because the SATF fee is the only fee which students can account where the money goes, I don't believe the Student Government is being negligent to the student body by advocating for a slight fee increase," Raphaely said.

Representatives from SCERA spoke at the senate meeting to help provide information, but refused to take a position on the motion for the SATF fee increase.

"The only position SCERA takes is to improve the quality of education and increase accessibility to this university," Robitaille said.

Video provides info about women with HIV, AIDS

By Emily Marino
Collegian Staff

The lives of women living with HIV or AIDS will be presented in a video documentary tonight at Hampshire College.

TREATING ME, a video directed and produced by graduating Hampshire College student Janna Goodwin, will address the experiences of ten local women living with HIV or AIDS. The video focuses on the physician/patient relationship and its effect upon the health and well-being of the women.

"[The video] is intended to work as a documentary that is accessible to anybody," Goodwin said. "It is clinical enough to provide information to physicians, but anybody who watches it will be engaged by it."

Goodwin said the video incorporates interviews with both women who have contracted HIV or AIDS as well as nurses and physicians. While the women speak candidly about their experiences with the disease, they also present these experiences to a live audience of physicians from the region in a theater piece.

"It presents medical and social issues that health care providers need to think about when treating patients in general, especially women who are HIV positive," Goodwin said. According to Goodwin, TREATING ME addresses how biases creep into the patient/physician relationship and prevent effective communication.

Goodwin said that the Division III project, which is comparable to a senior thesis, began 17 months ago. Goodwin was given a grant by the Department of Public Service and Social Change in the summer of 1993 to do an internship and social service project.

Goodwin, whose concentration is theater and music, wanted to address the issue of women affected by AIDS and HIV through film.

Goodwin contacted the Western Massachusetts Women and AIDS Work Group, which is affiliated with AIDS Allies in Springfield. According to Goodwin, the group is comprised of health care providers.

Study shows increased death rates

More heterosexuals have been diagnosed with HIV infection

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

According to a report issued by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention on Oct. 21, not only is HIV infection one of the leading causes of death in the United States, but it is increasing at a much faster rate than other causes.

In Morbidity and Mortality Report Summary of Notifiable Diseases, the CDCP reports that in 1991, HIV infection was the ninth leading cause of death in the United States, citing that 29,850 Americans died of HIV, thus accounting for 1.4 percent of all deaths.

Death rates on the rise

Presented out of context, these statistics may not seem like much, but, warns the report, AIDS "continues to cause an increasing proportion of all deaths." While death rates for diseases such as heart disease, cancer and chronic liver disease have remained relatively stable over the past 12 years, HIV infection rates have increased dramatically.

Since 1984, the number of Americans infected with HIV has risen more than 800 percent, from 1.88 per 100,000 in 1984 to 17.32 in 1991. If this rate of increase continues from 1991 to 1998, 138.56 out of every 100,000 Americans will be infected with HIV, making it the leading cause of death.

People living with AIDS/HIV

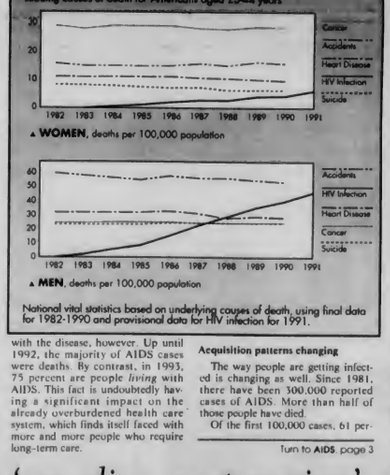
More and more people are living with the disease, however. Up until 1992, the majority of AIDS cases were deaths. By contrast, in 1993, 75 percent are people living with AIDS. This fact is undoubtedly having a significant impact on the already overburdened health care system, which finds itself faced with more and more people who require long-term care.



Acquisition patterns changing

The way people are getting infected is changing as well. Since 1981, there have been 300,000 reported cases of AIDS. More than half of those people have died.

Of the first 100,000 cases, 61 per-

Britannica Online trial service to be ending this week

By Kelly Spang
Collegian Staff

With finals and papers coming up in the home-stretch of the semester, Britannica Online offers students a vast amount of data at literally a touch of a few buttons.

This weekend is the final period students may access the Encyclopedia Britannica which is being offered to the University of Massachusetts on a two-week trial basis.

Any student or faculty member can access Britannica Online with a University Internet account.

John Nelson of the English department said he and other faculty members are trying to offer the Britannica Online on a permanent basis. The cost to offer the service to students would amount to approximately $1 per student per year, according to Nelson.

"If this is something the University community finds useful," said Art Clifford, director of public affairs, "there will be sources we can tap into" to find the funds to pay for Britannica Online on a permanent basis.

All 30 volumes of the Encyclopedia Britannica are available through this on-line service which contains over 44 million words. If students were to buy the actual volume of the encyclopedia it would cost in the range of $16,000, Nelson said.

Through the trial service, students have access to all the data through their computers at no cost, and the data in Britannica Online is also updated every four months, Nelson said.

Britannica Online also offers students access to Merriam- Webster's Collegiate Dictionary and a thesaurus.

Students using Britannica Online have access to more than just the data offered in the package because it is hooked into the world-wide web, a hypertext system on the Internet, which links students to global sources. Hypertext is the ability to link words which are highlighted on the screen with other documents.

There are two searches available through Britannica Online: Index search and a search by phrase, text or question. The index search looks up matches to the key words typed on the screen and also references other material so students may go more into depth on a particular topic or a related topic. Reference material further links students to the World-Wide Web to find data.

The search by phrase, text or question allows students to type in a question which will be answered through reference material. For example, the question "Is Plato sexist?" is not answered by the computer, but sources of information which could be used to answer the question are listed and referenced to further material.

Students may access Britannia Online until Monday and access to the service is relatively simple.

Logging—on

Once logged into the University Internet system, type "lynx" at the prompt. This will bring you to the University of Massachusetts Home Page.

Scroll down to page two of the home page and select the "Other Sources of Information" option. On the next screen, select "Data sources by subject."

The screen will then list subject catalogues available on the web. At this point, scroll to page five and select "Encyclopedia Britannica Online."

Once to the main menu of the Britannica Online, select the final option: "Search Britannica Online." In parenthesis, it will read subscribers only. All students are subscribers until Monday night.

To search either using the index or phrases, type in the word or words and then press return twice — the first return will highlight the search requested and the second return will initiate the search.

Another way to access the Britannica Online is through the Universal Resource Locator (URL): http://www.eb.com. Once accessing the Internet, type in "lynx" and once in the UMass Home Page, type "G" and then the URL. This is a more direct route to the Britannica Online.

Nelson said he would like all students who use Britannica Online to drop him a note in campus mail at Bartlett Hall to let him know how the experience was. Nelson said if he receives a lot of positive feed-back, it could result in the service being offered on a more permanent basis.

Members run People's Market with 'equality, cooperation'

By Emily Gold
Collegian Correspondent

At 7:45 every weekday morning coffee is brewed, bagel orders are received, and cash is taken from the safe to the register in preparation for morning customers at the People's Market in the Student Union at the University of Massachusetts.

During the lunch rush and throughout the day, employees rush to keep coffee, bagels, cheeses and produce on the shelves to feed hungry members of the University community.

The People's Market, a student-run co-operative, consists of 27 University undergraduates who are committed not only to making money through part-time employment, but to running a business based on consensus, equality and cooperation.

According to its Constitution, the Market, a Registered Student Organization, serves the University community by providing natural and fresh foods, by promoting the co-operative and collective movements, and by educating and informing.

"We are a market that is there for the students to provide an alternative to the mainstream products," said Burke Sampson, a senior anthropology major who has worked at the Market for two semesters.

Sampson said that alternatives include healthy food and socially responsible products, including the coffee, which is bought from Equal Exchange, a business that Sampson said ensures that coffee growers are paid fairly.

Because the Market is a co-operative, workers hold equal power and positions. Leadership in different areas alternates among employees.

"Ethically, there is an interest in not having a hierarchial structure," Sampson said.

Stocks Take Dive, Long–Term Bonds Up

NEW YORK (AP) —Stocks fell sharply, as nervous investors liquidated positions amid fears about higher interest rates and a bankruptcy filing by Orange County, Calif.

Several waves of computer-guided sell programs also took the market lower, traders said.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell more than 50 points late in the session, prompting the New York Stock Exchange to restrict program trading.

Stocks gave ground even after bonds, which had been declining the stock market for some time, recovered in mid-session. The 30-year bond was up 5-32 point late in the day and yielding 7.85 per cent, but short-term Treasuries were lower.

Interest Rate Prospects Key Dollar Gains

LONDON (AP) — The dollar advanced against most key currencies in European trading today, buoyed by expectations that the U.S. Federal Reserve will raise short-term interest rates later this month.

Gold prices fell.

Comments by Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan before Congress on Wednesday that inflationary pressures are building in the U.S. economy fueled speculation that the central bank will boost rates when its policymakers meet on Dec. 20.

There has been a marked change in sentiment, with expectations rising for an increase in U.S. rates on Dec. 20," said Adam Chester, a strategist for Yamaichi International in London. The Fed has raised U.S. rates six times this year in its efforts to slow America's economic growth and pre-empt inflation.

Cold Weather Triggers Demand For Crops

CHICAGO (AP) —Grain and soybean futures prices rose moderately Thursday on the Chicago Board of Trade as cold weather boosted livestock feed usage and prompted winterkill worries in wheat country.

Soybeans benefited from stronger demand for soybean meal, a high-protein livestock feed.

"The meals finally caught fire," said Joe Victor, marketing director for Allendale Inc., a futures brokerage firm in Crystal Lake, Ill. "With this colder weather, you'll see producers using a little more meal to keep the weight gains going."

Soybean meal for December delivery jumped $2.20 to $157.70 per ton.

The gains in soybean: were limited by perceptions the Brazilian soybean crop is off to a good start due to recent rains.

■ People's Market a student–run co– operative business

Sampson said equality and cooperation allow members to participate in running a business instead of simply serving as hired employees.

"It is not a job where you punch in and punch out," Sampson said. "There is a more active involvement in making decisions."

For example, Sampson said, a committee of six elected members handle all aspects of product buying by placing orders with vendors and ensuring that appropriate amounts of stock are ordered when necessary.

The Market's 17 committees also address employment issues by leading hiring and staff evaluations process.

The Market's hiring committee hires approximately five people each semester, said Emily Bibbins, a senior majoring in sociology and African–American studies, who has worked at the Market for three semesters.

"I like [to hire] people who are open to new ideas and are creative and innovative," Bibbins said.

Led by the diversity awareness committee, the Market is in the process of designing affirmative action guidelines that expand on University policy to address post–hiring issues, said committee member Bibbins.

The committee hopes to establish an atmosphere where "differences are not just ignored, but accepted and embraced," Bibbins said.

Committees also provide Market organization in recycling, advertising, bookkeeping and maintenance, among other areas.

Responsibility is delegated in the Market through job shifts, which include making coffee, stocking products, working at the register and facilitation, said Luke Hass, a sophomore majoring in economics and international relations who has worked at the Market for two semesters.

"A lot of our work is keeping things on the shelves because we don't have a lot of space," Hass said.

Each shift includes a shift facilitator, a position that alternates among all who have worked at the Market for more than one semester.

The shift facilitator, who ensures that all stations are covered and all jobs are accomplished, is not a supervisor or boss, Bibbins said.

"It's a good way to learn how to delegate responsibility without being an authority figure," Bibbins said.

Since the Market is a Registered Student Organization, the University provides space for the Market at no cost and offers free repairs, Sampson said.

The Market's income statement for the month of October shows that the Market ended the month with a profit of $4,377.07.

Bibbins attributes increasing revenue to a larger number of customers.

"I think our customer base is growing," Bibbins said.

Profits cover costs of semester openings, unexpected losses, and reinvestment into the business, which can include upgrading of equipment and charitable donations, according to Market literature.

The Market is able to keep product prices low since profit is not a major concern, Sampson said.

"We're not concerned with expansion as much as another business," he said.

Consensus is reached during weekly staff meetings by allowing members to vote in support, opposition, or abstention to proposals presented to the group.

Any member is able to block passage of a proposal simply by stating opposition.

Bibbins said that opposition by a single member is "very rare."

Sampson said that allowing all members to voice their opinions is time consuming, but beneficial.

"I like the fact that there is a more equal distribution of power," Sampson said.

Student uses Internet to spread religious ideas

■ Doctress Neutopia founds new religion based on 'love, respect for the environment'

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts doctoral student is using the Internet spiritually.

Libby Hubbard, who calls herself Doctress Neutopia, founded an Internet religion based on love, respect for the environment, and the worship of nature and goddesses.

Over her Internet account and newsgroup, Doctress Neutopia's religion, called Gaia, has followers, and opposition, from all over the world.

"In the Gaia religion, we're all looking for true love," said Doctress Neutopia. "Not love for yourself, but dedication to life on Earth, to create a communal environment."

Doctress Neutopia and those who agree with her, believe that to live a life based on love, people must move away from patriarchal religions such as Christianity, and worship the trinitarian goddess in the from of the Mother, the Virgin and the Crone, or wise woman.

Other ideologies of Gaia include reincarnation, recycling, not only of natural resources but of spirits and souls, and looking to life on earth as paradise, Doctress Neutopia said.

"In all religions you have the archetype of where you want to go, such as the Kingdom of Heaven in Christianity," Neutopia said. "In the Gaia religion we're going to create this paradise on Earth."

Neutopia said Gaia mixes science with religion and art. Gaia is based on a very holistic philosophy, according to Neutopia.

"In the Gaia religion, everything is sacred," Neutopia said.

Gaia deals with more than just visions of an idealist world. Gaia also has concepts of economics and a feminist theory of architecture, according to Doctress Neutopia.

"Architecture is very connected with religion," she said.

The economic theories of Gaia have to do with the class distinctions in today's society. Doctress Neutopia herself is struggling with the powers that concern matters of money, she said.

"I feel very oppressed as a poor woman," she said. "This system is only going to work for the rich."

The feminist aspect of Gaia is based on the idea that things change when women are sought for their wisdom. Using Neutopian ideals, Doctress Neutopia and other Gaians plan to build a farming society where everyone's needs are filled, she said.

According to Doctress Neutopia, our society focus' to much on money and not enough on the art of philosophy.

"If our society doesn't start supporting creative artists this system will turn into a shopping mall," she said.

Doctress Neutopia uses the Internet as an economical, efficient and simple way to spread her messages throughout the world. Using the Internet, interested people may read messages in Doctress Neutopia's newsgroup, poetry by Doctress Neutopia herself, or even love letters written from Doctress Neutopia to her cyberspace lover in South Africa.

"Our only salvation is to start listening to the crone, the wise woman, and be midwives to a new world."

A first step for interested Gaians would be to download Doctress Neutopia's college dissertation which explains her ideals and beliefs. Doctress Neutopia was encouraged by her peers not to publish her dissertation on the Internet, but to go to the printed press instead and sell the rights to it. She decided to give it away instead.

"If I hold back this enlightenment I'm becoming part of the problem," Doctress Neutopia said. "As a scholar and servant to humanity, that's what I need to do."

Doctress Neutopia encourages people to learn how to use the Internet and teach it to others so everyone can exchange ideas and share their love.

"If everyone teaches others how to use this, we can have an e-mail love-a-lution," Doctress Neutopia said. "The present economical reality is trying to stop it from happening."

According to Doctress Neutopia, the University of Massachusetts, a place of education, is greatly lacking in love, which she considers to be the most important sort of education.

"UMass should be the place where people are meeting their loves and gaining friendships," Doctress Neutopia said. "This system in anti–love."

Not everyone is taken with Doctress Neutopia's ideals. A group called the Utopian Monster Truckers is a group Doctress Neutopia describes as "anti–Goddess" and against her religion.

Doctress Neutopia has even received personal hate mail. She said she received a letter from a man who said he would cut off her head, another who said he would burn her house down, and another who said his gad wanted to napalm her.

"I've met real gentlemen too," Doctress Neutopia said. "I've met both kinds [of people]."

For now, the Doctress is in love with the Internet. According to Doctress Neutopia, the Internet offers her unlimited freedom of communication and expression.

"Communication makes me happy," she said. "With the Internet I can be the person I want to be."

Interested people can speak with Doctress Neutopia herself. All people need are a computer, a modem, and an Internet account.

Interested people can join in on the discussions by accessing the World Wide Web on the Internet. Doctress Neutopia's newsgroup is alt.society.neutopia.

"We are like infants in love," Doctress Neutopia said. "Let's just start loving."

Reinstated student judiciary acts as RSO watchdog

By Justin Doyle
Collegian Staff

After nearly a year of painstaking work revising and rewriting the by–laws and constitution of the Student Government Association [SGA], the University of Massachusetts now has a working judiciary much like the Supreme Court.

The student judiciary is a seven member court which has jurisdiction over all organizations which fall under the Campus Activities Cluster. The judiciary, which was eliminated in 1985, was reinstated after the constitution and by–laws of the SGA were rewritten last year.

According to the SGA constitution and by–laws, the court has the power to find any agent or act of the SGA, any agency related to the SGA, or any candidate for SGA office, to be unconstitutional or in violation of any by–law or act of the SGA.

The student judiciary was created to serve as a type of watchdog, to insure that University organizations are doing their jobs properly, said chief justice Steve Cohen.

"When anyone within the SGA violates the constitution they are prone to review by the judiciary," Cohen said. "We are an internal police."

According to Cohen, the judiciary has the power to watch over the constitutions and agency charters of the Registered Student Organizations, including the student radio station, Union Video Center, the Office of Third World Affairs and the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy.

"Something like a controversy over the budget is a good example of the type of case that can be taken to the judiciary," Cohen said.

The student judiciary has the power to handle the impeachment of the SGA president, at which the chief justice presides over the undergraduate student senate. The court also keeps records of all acts by the SGA and amendments to the constitution and by–laws.

According to Cohen, one of the reasons that the judiciary was reinstated is that there have been several events on campus that could have been taken to the court, had it been operating.

"There were a lot of things happening around us that needed a proper outlet and didn't have one," Cohen said. "They were all handled, but inappropriately."

Incidents throughout last year, such as the controversy over the allocation of money for Louis Farrakhan and the dismissal of a undergraduate student senator for actions at a senate meeting, are just two cases that could have been handled by the court, according to Cohen.

"We estimated that approximately 10 incidents that happened last year, and at least five major ones, could have gone to the judiciary," Cohen said.

This semester, the judiciary has been working on three major areas, Cohen said.

"First we created the court, and then established it within the University," Cohen said. "We also have been training the judiciary on constitutional law, ethics and judicial procedure and behavior."

Currently, the student judiciary has two cases pending. According to Cohen, two cases will file petitions for hearings and have a possibility for review before the end of the semester.

cent were gay and bisexual men who contracted the disease through homosexual contact. Twenty percent were men and women who had used intravenous (IV) drugs and 5 percent of cases were heterosexual men and women, many of whom were hemophiliacs or recipients of blood transfusions or tissue transplants.

The second 100,000 cases presented a slightly different face to the epidemic: fewer gay and bisexual men (55 percent), more men and women who used IV drugs (24 percent), and more heterosexuals (7 percent).

The latest 100,000 cases are expected to include fewer gay and bisexual men, more IV drug users, and more heterosexuals, a high percentage of whom are Black.

Disproportionate percentage of Blacks

In one of the report's most significant findings, Blacks made up more than 31 percent of the second 100,000 cases. This is despite the fact that Blacks make up only 12.5 percent of the U.S. population.

In 1990, AIDS was the leading cause of death nationwide of Black men, ages 35 to 44, and the second leading cause for Black children, ages 1 to 4.

Furthermore, AIDS afflicts Black women nine times more than White women, according to an article on AIDS/HIV by Wayne L. Greaves in Handbook of Black American Health.

Greaves blames these disproportionate death and infection rates on several factors. First, during most of the epidemic, Blacks were left out of clinical trials and research as efforts were geared towards gay, White men.

Prevention efforts tended to leave out Blacks as well. Many Blacks have not received much education on AIDS/HIV. The messages that have reached them are often directed in a culturally insensitive manner. To these Blacks, the disease seems like a "White man's disease," and not something that they have to worry about.

Finally, writes Greaves, many Blacks lack access to affordable, non–racist healthcare. This makes it difficult for them to obtain information on the disease, get tested for HIV, or receive treatment once they are infected.

Gingrich's high profile could hurt Republicans

By John King
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Newt Gingrich's early public reviews suggest he is on a path to becoming the most polarizing major figure in American politics, a distinction some Republicans worry could ultimately hurt the party.

In making this point, independent pollsters and some Republicans draw a comparison to President Clinton and data showing that support for policy positions slips when Clinton's name is attached.

But that dynamic is far more likely to affect a president than the speaker of the House, the job Gingrich, R-Ga., will assume Jan. 4. And in any event, the public's questions about Gingrich don't appear to have adversely affected its view of the GOP agenda.

A Times Mirror Center for the People and the Press survey released this week, for example, showed 52 percent supported the Republicans' plans while 28 percent opposed them and 20 percent weren't sure.

But the same survey suggested Gingrich is not sharing in the glow of the Republican election victory: 25 percent said they have a favorable opinion of him, while 28 percent had an unfavorable view. Thirty percent said they had never heard of Gingrich, and 17 percent said they didn't know enough to offer an opinion.

Given Gingrich's prominent media profile since the election, it is somewhat surprising that nearly one-third of the public says it has never heard of him. But just five months ago, 65 percent said that, so his name identity is rising rapidly.

In May 1990, by comparison, nearly half of Americans had never heard of Rep. Thomas Foley, who by then had been House speaker for nearly a year. But of those who had, Foley was rated favorably by 20 percent and unfavorably by just 9 percent. By March 1991, Foley's name recognition has risen substantially, and 41 percent viewed him favorably while the percentage viewing him unfavorably ticked up to just 10 percent.

In Gingrich's case, the percentage viewing him unfavorably has gone from 12 percent in July to 28 percent in the survey conducted last weekend.

"Gingrich is a lot more partisan than Foley," said GOP pollster Neil Newhouse. But, he said, "How he is viewed this month is irrelevant to how he is viewed after he actually takes power."

Indeed, many Republicans predict Gingrich's ratings will improve dramatically if House Republicans cut committees, adopt a balanced budget amendment and move quickly on other reforms. "The message and agenda he has is exactly on the mark of what people want," said GOP pollster Ed Goeas.

Democrats are aggressively trying to muddy Gingrich's image, repeatedly attacking his politics as extreme as well as demanding an ethics investigation into the financing of a college course he taught. "He is the most dangerous man in America to the Democratic Party," Goeas said.

While optimistic Gingrich will use his formidable political skills to boost his image, even many of his biggest fans are worried about the early pulling trends.

"It concerns me greatly," said Republican pollster Frank Luntz. "I watched how (then-Speak)'Neill came to represent all that was wrong with the Democrats in 1980."

Luntz complained that Gingrich is often quoted out of context by the media. But he conceded Gingrich makes his fair share of enemies on his own because "he doesn't mince words."

In the past week alone, for example, Gingrich has accused up to 25 percent of the White House staff of using illegal drugs in recent years and defended a proposal to create orphanages for the children of women who could not afford to support them.

consumers and people interested in the HIV/AIDS issue, such as consumer advocates.

"I asked what was needed, and what could I do that was useful," Goodwin said. She discovered a lack of information about AIDS and HIV for physicians in general, and especially people who deal with women's reproductive systems.

"Basically, physicians were not recognizing early signs of HIV in their female patients," Goodwin said.

"This still seems to be the case. Physicians would not suspect that a woman had HIV if she did not fill certain criteria," Goodwin referred to women who are prostitutes or drug users as examples of commonly suspected patients.

Goodwin said that she was very fortunate to get in touch with Ellen Miller Mack, a physician at the Brightwood Rivertview Clinic in Springfield. After hearing about Goodwin's documentary idea, Mack asked her patients if they would like to share their experiences for the project.

The 10 clinic patients who responded were interviewed by Goodwin privately, and later met as a group. The women worked on the theater piece and a panel discussion which follows in the video.

"It seemed to be very well-received by the physicians, and the women seemed to have a very good time," Goodwin spoke about the panel discussion. She also said that the network of women living with HIV or AIDS who worked on the project was very supportive.

"For the time that we were all together, there was a strong feeling of cohesion in the group," Goodwin said. She also said that many of the women, some of whom knew each other before the project, still contacted each other or belong to the same organizations within the community of people living with AIDS.

Goodwin, who will graduate in a few weeks, said she hopes eventually to distribute the video nation–wide to medical schools and other organizations.

As a student, Goodwin said she could not have completed the project without the help of Hampshire College, Media Production Specialist John Gunther, and the organizations that helped her.

TREATING ME will be show tonight at 7 p.m. in Hampshire College's Ash Auditorium in Adele Simmons Hall. A reception will follow the screening.

GLBT community is one of the more diverse on campus

They come in all shapes, sizes and colors. Some of them have grown up here in America, and some come from faraway places. They speak English, Spanish, Chinese, Arabic and many other languages.

They are gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender.

They call themselves by a lot of names, as a matter of fact. Some use words like "fag" and "dyke," throwing the world's insults back at the heterosexuals who have oppressed them. Some use words from their own languages. Others simply live their lives without labels, choosing to live as individuals and follow their own models.

Some of these people seem just like the stereotypes: White, blue-eyed blondes with lisps and limp wrists. Strong, independent women with buzz-cuts and leather jackets. Bisexuals who spend their lives jumping from bed to bed, their need for sex seemingly insatiable. Men in dresses who insist they're not really men, so please don't call them that, not ever.

Wendy Darling

There's more to a person than a stereotype, however. Every individual is different, with a lifetime of experiences, feelings and interests unlike anyone else's. Often they have arrived at their present state purely by chance, not by any choice of their own. Did they choose to become a stereotype? Certainly not. They simply became themselves.

On the other hand, there are many gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender people who do not fit these stereotypes. They are the "invisible" queers. The ones at your work, in your classes, in your dorm, in your family.

Some of them are "invisible" because they're in the closet. They don't talk about their personal lives, or, if they do, they don't tell the whole truth. Years of living in this homophobic society have taught them that if they come out and become visible their lives will fall apart. They will lose their friends, their jobs, the respect of their teachers, and the love of their families. And so they suffer in silence, afraid to be seen or known by the rest of the world.

There are other queers who are "invisible" because they have been made so by people who just don't want to see them. Day after day, they deal with people who think that being gay or bisexual or transgender is something you just shouldn't talk about. "Those people are fine, as long as they stay away from me," they say.

Stereotypes get in the way of seeing those people all the time. The person, straight or gay, who thinks that queer people are all White is missing a lot of the picture — a lot of the world, as a matter of fact. The person who thinks all gay men are privileged and live in expensive apartments in the South End have yet to touch base with reality. The person who sees a Black woman or a woman in a wheelchair and automatically thinks, "No way can she be a lesbian," needs to realize some fundamental facts.

Gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender people do not come from some country called Queerland. They don't immigrate to mainstream America with all their strange customs intact. Few of them were raised by queer parents. They didn't go to queer schools. They don't speak some very particular queer language.

Queer people come from where you came from. They come from ghettoes and little towns out in the country. They come from cities in Asia and suburbs in Europe. They have parents not unlike your own. They grew up speaking your language.

And now they are here at UMass, studying and preparing for the rest of their lives. They don't want their own country and they don't need everyone to join them. They want to be allowed to live the same way most people are allowed to live. Some of them even want to live in a world that's better for all people.

Maybe that's a little queer, but it figures, doesn't it?

Letters to the Editor

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian welcomes and encourages letters to the editor. When writing, please TYPE your letter and keep it to a maximum of 400 words. We would much rather print several concise letters in the limited space available on the page.

The Editorial/Opinion page will occasionally print guest columns, but arrangements must be made in advance. If you feel you have a unique perspective on an issue of general interest, contact the Ed/Op staff before you submit anything longer than a standard letter.

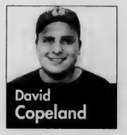
All letters should include a name, address and phone number (for verification purposes only). Students should also include their year and major. The Collegian reserves the right to edit submissions for grammar, clarity and length.

Watching TV with morons isn't any fun

All I wanted was to take a study break. I set myself up with a cup of coffee and made my way down to the Campus Center basement to watch "Seinfeld."

It's a good show, a funny show. But not as funny as some of the moronic strangers who had gathered to watch it with me last Thursday night thought it was.

These are the imbeciles who laugh a hideous, almost fake sounding laugh at every word spoken. They talk to the television screen as if someone as intelligent as Kramer would take advice from these simpletons.



David Copeland

They repeated lines of dialogue to no one in particular, as if I was as stupid as them and didn't get the relatively blatant humor the first time around.

"Did you hear that? George said that Susan left him for another woman."

We haven't had a working television in my apartment for almost a year now. I take what little viewing time I get seriously, almost as if it were a divine experience. These people gathered to watch Seinfeld were as rude as the two little old ladies who used to gossip through each Sunday service when I used to go to church.

There was the guy who gave color commentary throughout the 30-minute show. As George made politically incorrect statements about "alternative lifestyles," this guy would say inspired things like "He's got to be kidding," and "George is gonna get smacked for that one."

Then there was the woman who sympathized with Elaine and repeated every word she said. "Oh Jerry," she would squeal in near unison with Elaine. After she had said the line, she would add a fake and hideous giggle.

These are the imbeciles who laugh a hideous, almost fake sounding laugh at every word spoken.

Life without television started on January 1, 1994. Kind of a perverse New Year's Resolution. You go through withdrawals every so often, and last Thursday night was an attempt to get a quick fix that no one would have to know about. But the dose of my favorite drug was tainted with moronic babble from the gathered idiots.

Life without television hasn't been all bad. I read a lot more than I used to. Now I even study sometimes. People talk to each other more in our apartment because there is no longer a television to occupy all of their thoughts.

We never were the type of people to talk aimlessly to the screen.

But back down in the Campus Center basement no one knew my pain as I tried to struggle through a 30-minute show. Everybody there was the type of person to either talk at or around the screen.

My roommates and I broke down at one point and got a television for awhile this year. It was old and crusty, and to turn it on you had to smack the life out of it. The only time you could get reception was from three to four in the morning, when you could vaguely make out images of a home shopping network.

We didn't watch it, but we did borrow a VCR for awhile and spent mindless hours viewing movies. Then we had to give the VCR back, so we threw the TV out. It wasn't ours anyway.

Back at the Campus Center, there were two fools who sat on the last row of couches, loudly spitting brown tobacco juice into paper cups and talking about a yearning for some kind of Thursday night football. "It would be great," one prophesied. "They could start the game early, make it so 'Seinfeld' would come on during half time."

"Yeah," his companion agreed, a stream of brown juice trickling from the corner of his mouth. "Football half time shows are no good unless there's other games going on."

Seinfeld is "no good" when you're surrounded by meatheads.

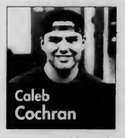
The pinnacle of laziness

Maybe it's senioritis. Maybe it's end-of-semester-itis. All I know is that my laziness has reached epic proportions, and I'm not exactly sure how to handle my condition.

How bad has it gotten? To give you an example, let's revisit Wednesday night's UMass–Pitt basketball game. For the past three years, I have been a regular at all the home games, and I was excited to see the Minutemen in person for their first home action of the year. (I was in attendance for the exhibition against the Turkish Junior National team, but I don't classify that as "action").



Caleb Cochran

Although I was enthusiastic about the game, I no longer had any desire to stand up throughout the game (a Calipari–era tradition), and thus filed back to the rear of section 'S.' I was very disturbed when a few scattered rows of people stood up, forcing me to stand up for portions of the game, or at least sit on the top of my collapsed seat.

What has become of me? Even the laziest of the lazy can manage to stand up to support the hoop squad, but now even this is too much to ask of me. I actually enjoy the hockey games more than the basketball games simply because I can park my lazy can in any seat in the joint without fear of having to stand up.

My new-found laziness extends far beyond the William D. Mullins Center. Getting up in the morning has always been a difficult process, but lately it's become nearly impossible. Since all of my weekdays start with 11:15 classes (a testament to laziness in itself), I usually set my alarm for 9:30. When the alarm sounds, I whack the snooze bar four times, which means I start thinking about getting out of bed at 10:06.

Lately however, I've taken things a step further. Knowing that another nine minutes of sleep will cause me to miss the 10:42 bus, I somehow manage to reach over and reset the alarm, so that I can sleep an extra five minutes instead of the nine that an extra "snooze" would provide. Never mind that the energy I spend furiously pressing the buttons on the Dream Machine could be much better spent trying to move into an upright position. Sleep, and sleep only, is what drives me to such lengths.

Living off campus this semester has produced even more ways for me to practice my sluggish behavior.

Surrendering my meal plan status has created a most unfavorable circumstance — dirty dishes. Now, thank goodness that my kind-hearted housemate usually gets sick of the stench that floods the apartment before I do and usually breaks down and washes the dishes. But the fact that I cook spaghetti on a Monday and have to reach into the depths of the sink on Friday to retrieve the dirty pot so that I can make another meal is pretty sad.

And that's not the worst of it. In order to cut down on dishes in any way possible, I have taken to buying disposable plastic cups and paper plates. But get this. I don't even bother to rinse out the cups so that I can reuse them. Nope, it's one drink and done for these babies. I shudder to think how much money I've spent on Solo 16-ounce cups this semester. I might as well just buy stock in the company.

With all the disposable items consumed in my apartment, the handling of garbage has become a comical situation. Whenever my housemate and I go to Stop & Shop, we smuggle a stack of paper bags out with us. So, instead of one collective garbage can in the kitchen, we now have about eight Stop & Shop bags filled with various types of refuse. I managed to get off my easy chair last Sunday and carry the bags out to the dumpster, but it sure wasn't easy.

I really wish I knew when I moved from the "relatively" lazy category into the "tremendously" lazy column. If I get any lazier, this will be the last column you see from me because I'm going to stop getting out of bed altogether.

A not–so–funny childhood tale

Earlier this semester, I was asked by one of my professors to tell the class a funny childhood story. I couldn't think of anything that happened to me that was funny. But I did have a story. I didn't know if it would be considered funny. But you can decide for yourself. So here it goes . . .

David Chan

It was the summer of 1981 and I was six years old. There was a girl that lived next door to me named Joannie. She was five years old and we went to the same elementary school.

Joannie was a spunky, high-spirited, little girl who could never sit still. Her ragged blond hair, bright blue eyes, and wide smile could bring a smile to anybody's face. She was obedient to grown-ups and friendly to me. My mom loved her. Being with Joannie kept me out of trouble.

Every time that I was with Joannie, she'd only want to play one thing: family. Obviously, I had to be the daddy and she would be the mommy.

One of Joannie's rules to playing family was that the mommy and the daddy had to take off all of their clothes. I was shocked.

"I've never seen my Mommy and Daddy take their clothes off!" I said to Joannie.

Joannie rolled her eyes.

"Of course you've never seen them. They do it in private," she explained.

We had just finished playing a board game in her bedroom. I looked out the open door.

"The door's open. We're not in private," I said.

Joannie got up off the bed and closed the door.

"We have privacy now. So, do you want to kiss me?" she asked with a big, bright smile.

My eyes widened. How yucky I thought. Kiss a girl?

"So are you going to or not?" Joannie asked again.

"Uh, sure. But I want you to brush your teeth first," I answered.

Joannie went to the bathroom and brushed her teeth. She was serious about playing family.

She returned to the bedroom and closed the door behind her.

"Now we have to take off our clothes," she ordered as she started pulling down her pants.

"Put your pants back up!" I said. She looked at me and laughed.

"Put your pants back up!" I said again.

She didn't listen to me.

"C'mon, you too Daddy," she said. "It's part of the rules."

I sighed but took my clothes off. Then we kissed. I could taste the minty toothpaste. We were on our way to playing family.

After awhile of kissing, there was a knock on the door. It was Joannie's mother.

"Joannie, when you're done playing can you run down to the liquor store and pick me up a pack of cigarettes?" she asked.

"Sure, Mom," answered Joannie. "I'll bring David with me too."

A year later, Joannie and her mother moved. Needless to say, I don't remember where they moved to. I had fun playing family that summer. And throughout elementary school, I had a twisted view of girls. I thought that all girls liked to play family. I remember thinking how great it'd be to play family again.

To this date, I haven't seen Joannie since. I hope that she's doing fine. If I ever happen to see her again, I'd like to chat with her over a cup of coffee. I wonder if she still likes to play family.

My professor didn't laugh.

Story about RSO is misleading

To the editor:

The choice of words used in the story titled "An exclusive organization for Puerto Rican students emerges," on Dec. 6 is misleading. As members of the working group of Boricuas Unidos, the organization written about, we find the title counterproductive to our organization's goals and uninspired.

None of the information provided to the writer made any reference to exclusivity. The word exclusive implies confining membership to a certain group, in this case Puerto Ricans. This, however, is not what Boricuas Unidos is about.

Our constitution clearly states that, "Membership is not restricted to Puerto Ricans. There shall be no discrimination on the basis of race, nationality, creed, sex, religion." Our intention is also to inform "the University of Massachusetts at Amherst and the Five-College area on the issues affecting the Puerto Rican community."

We encourage participation from anyone interested in learning about the Puerto Rican culture and the issues we deal with. Our ultimate goal is, as our name states, unidad, or unity, for the Puerto Rican community. We believe we can achieve this without alienating those who are not Puerto Rican.

We, the Working Group of Boricuas Unidos, ask that you make this correction known to the public.

Locals to play benefit concert

Five bands performing to aid the Amherst Survival Center

COURTESY SOURPUSS

This Saturday night Van Meter Basement will host one of the largest showcases of local talent this year as five area bands take the stage.

The show is being sponsored by the Housing Cable Network radio station WOCH, and all proceeds will go to the North Amherst Survival Center.

Headlining the show are the local punk act Pangloss, who have played the area frequently, including a set at last spring's much ballyhooed Loud Music Festival. The band has been together for about a year and has already recorded a five-song demo tape which they are shopping around to various labels. They are currently working on new material and hope to be back in the studio in about a month.

Local favorites Meristem fill the second slot on the bill with their popular brand of high intensity grunge. The band which was formed in Van Meter in 1993 has opened for the likes of Stompbox and most recently for Helium and Pulvo in the UMass Bluewall. They will put out a 7" single on their own label in the near future.

Anchoring the middle of the bill will be area band Sourpuss, who since forming last June, have played such venues as The Bay State, Pearl Street and The Green River Cafe. They recently self-released their first 7" single, Rocket Day, which showcases their unique rhythmic, angular pop attack. With a repertoire of over 20 catchy songs (but only three having been committed to tape), their live show is the best way to experience their undiminished, energetic sound.

Preceding Sourpuss will be the Northshore based Sue40Sue, who proudly refer to themselves as "the band that likes to flirt with death." They will play their melodic pop/punk a la Jawbreaker or Doc Hopper in their first ever area performance.

Opening the show will be Orchard Hill faves The Mitchells. Since their conception in May, the band has been winning over a growing following with their edgy alternative pop. They have already become a staple of campus coffee houses and have played the Fire And Water Cafe in Northampton twice.

The show is one of the few campus sponsored concerts of the semester left, so be sure to check it out.

The WOCH benefit show will be held Dec. 10 in the Van Meter basement. Admission $2: $1 w/ two cans of food. Doors open at 7:30 p.m.

Triple bill set to rock the SUB

By Matthew Justin Faerber
Collegian Staff

On Dec. 12, University Productions and Concerts will present their final and potentially most explosive show of the semester at the Student Union Ballroom. The event is a triple bill featuring Shudder To Think, Sunny Day Real Estate and Brainiac.

Shudder To Think has been one of the biggest names in the world of hardcore/pop for several years now. The band's continued success stems in part from their ability to maintain an effective balance between their hard-edged roots and a constantly evolving sense of melodic experimentation.

Formed in Washington D.C. in 1986, Shudder To Think quickly became an integral part of the local scene, joining the ranks of such hardcore giants as Fugazi and Jawbox.

In 1990 they released their first album on Dischord records. After two more LPs on Dischord, the original line– up splintered and the present line–up of bassist Stuart Hill, drummer Adam Wade, guitarist Nathan Larson, and singer/guitarist Craig Wedren was solidified.

Since then, the band has been riding a wave of commercial success generated by their signing to Epic records. They garnered many new fans with their cover of "Animal Wild" on last year's Victoria Williams tribute album Sweet Relief. Their latest album, Pony Express Record, was recently released to wide–spread critical praise.

Shudder To Think's sound is unpredictable to say the least. The band can shift in a heartbeat from drifting, ethereal melodies to viciously abrasive guitars and back again. The result can be startling to the first time listener.

Singer Craig Wedren can also be quite startling. His engaging, operatic, vocal style contrasts with the more traditional hardcore approach of the band's music.

Furthermore, Wedren has developed a reputation for some pretty bizarre stage antics. The most extreme example of which was last fall, when on tour with Smashing Pumpkins. At a show in San Diego, he appeared on a stage wearing only a pair of socks and proceeded to perform the entire set stark naked.

Also appearing Monday night will be Sunny Day Real Estate, a band which has been causing quite a stir in the indie–rock world lately.

Sunny Day Real Estate burst upon the music scene just last year and have been the subject of countless accolades ever since. Their most recent release Diary, on the Sub Pop label, is highly emotional rock and their live performances are reputed to be exceptional.

Opening up the show will be the infamous Dayton, Ohio four–piece Brainiac. Their music integrates aspects of punk, pop and experimental noise into a thoroughly unique context.

Their last album Smack Bunny Baby (produced by Girls Against Boys' Eli Janney) was hailed by Spin magazine as one of the ten best albums you didn't hear in 1993. With the recent release of their Bonsai Superstar LP and subsequent tour, Brainiac's days of relative obscurity may be numbered.

Shudder To Think, Sunny Day Real Estate, and Brainiac will be playing at the S.U.B. Dec. 12. The show starts at 8:00 p.m. Admission is $6/ UM I.D.; $8/general. Tickets are available at Strawberries, Tix Unlimited, For The Record, and the Northampton Box Office. For more information call Stacey Peck at 545–2892.

Thompson discusses the past, humor and Junior

By Paul Geitner
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Emma Thompson made her mark (and won an Academy Award) in lavish British period pieces such as Howards End and Remains of the Day, and in film adaptations of Shakespeare with her husband, Kenneth Branagh.

So what is she doing in a new Hollywood comedy with Arnold Schwarzenegger?

"I have always been completely fascinated by Arnold," she says in a recent interview, jokingly describing the Hollywood megastar as "sort of a mythical beast."

The chance to juxtapose their polar-opposite screen personas — tough-guy action hero meets intellectual, proper British woman — was too intriguing for Thompson to pass up.

"I just thought it was a really good idea," she says. "I thought it was a funny idea as well, precisely because of my kind of bluestocking image."

Junior is the story of a cold, driven scientist with poor social skills (Schwarzenegger) who is persuaded by his partner (Danny DeVito) to test a fertility drug on himself when the feds pull the plug on their experiments.

The continual gags (picture Schwarzenegger in drag, or on an eating binge) are tempered with lessons about sensitivity and parenthood learned over the course of the pregnancy. The Universal Pictures film was released in time for the Thanksgiving Day holiday and emerged in the top 10 at the box office.

Thompson plays the part of a pencil-chewing, absent-minded professor — a female Jerry Lewis — who unknowingly donates an egg to the project and winds up falling in love.

Sipping cappuccino in a Manhattan hotel, gray-suede-booted feet up on the coffee table, Thompson says she signed on to Junior because she was looking for a change and the script offered something rare, especially for Hollywood: an interesting female role.

"It was something I'd never seen before," she says. "It was a work-obsessed scientist who was perfectly satisfied with her life. Nothing wrong with her life — very clumsy, so there's wonderful opportunities for slapstick — and who becomes a sort of father figure.

"I thought it was great because it was original."

In addition, she says, the female character is not the guinea pig — for a change. "It's nice to see the woman maintaining her integrity all the way through and the man being fiddled about with."

Junior also gave Thompson, 35, a chance to return to her comedic roots. Although she's appeared in such lighthearted fare as Much Ado About Nothing and Peter's Friends, most of the attention and acclaim she's received in recent years have been for her dramatic roles.

She won an Oscar in 1993 for her Howards End role as a freethinking woman who marries into money in Edwardian England, followed by two nominations last year for The Remains of the Day and In the Name of the Father.

"I really wanted to do a comedy," Thompson says. "It's where I thought I'd always be working."

Thompson joined "Footlights," a theatrical troupe that launched many British comics, during her second year at Cambridge. She also did some stand-up, although she concentrated on monologues and revues.

"Really what I wanted to be was Lily Tomlin," she says, describing both Tomlin and her writing partner, Jane Wagner, as geniuses.

Learning to survive the battle known as finals week

Towards the end of the semester, a lot of students undoubtedly will start to feel the pressure of an increased work load and start to go a little insane at times. But I get the feeling that we don't really mean it when we say that we hate finals time. In fact, there is just something almost magical about it.

It's being up at 4 a.m. and knowing that you are not alone. Everybody is in the same boat (some worse than others), but we all at one time or another have had just 2 hours of sleep and spent the night repeatedly dozing off and waking up to catch yourself drooling all over your text book.

Mike's Mental Stew

If procrastination was considered an art form, I'm sure college students would be considered the gurus. I never realized that a click pen could keep me occupied for a half hour until I spent one night trying to see how fast I could take one apart and put it back together instead of studying for some intro. level class.

And intro. classes are the worse, aren't they? Most of them have those dreaded comprehensive finals that have you making notecards and highlighting outlines until your hands are pink and filled with paper-cuts. Pink notecards are most definitely a no-no, your eyes will be popping out of your head by the wee hours of the morning.

The thing about finals is that if you have access to a car, a strong cup of coffee is just a few minutes down the road at the Whatly Diner. The best thing about it is that you don't have to explain to anyone where you're going late at night. If I told my parents I was going out at 4 a.m. to get a cup of java, they'd laugh in my face.

If you're not into coffee, the business community has all sorts of stuff out there that is supposed to keep you awake. No-Doz, Vivarin and of course, Mountain Dew and Jolt. Rumor has it that if you have two No-Doz and a liter bottle of Coke, you can hear bugs crawling on the inside of the wall. Just a rumor, I wouldn't advise trying it.

My personal favorite is a can of diet cola, (anything as long as it has Nutrasweet) and a couple sticks of Trident. The combination of the Nu-trasweet and the Saccharin will make your head feel like it's going to explode. And it won't keep you up for hours after you want to go to bed.

To go along with all the lovely beverages are the fantastic array of snacks that people swear by when the end of the semester comes around. Although candy bars and other junk food are favorites, more healthy things have become late night study faves.

Ramen Noodles are a cheap and easy thing to eat late at night, and, as I found out early this semester, even easier if you just eat 'em raw. Pop-Tarts are also good raw. And for those with toaster ovens (I can't imagine who would keep such illegal contraband in their room) they can even be eaten hot.

And while you're munching and studying away, you can explore that CD collection for those disks that you never quite got around to listening to completely. I've discovered some real hidden gems in my collection when I pulled them out to have some different music to study to. Just don't loop the disk continuously, you might lose track of time and not figure out until five hours later that you've gone through the disk six times.

Between voice–mail chain messages, food, drinks, music and figuring out how long you can balance a pencil under your nose, there doesn't seem to be much time for studying. It can't all be academics though, or after a while it just starts rolling off your back. So just sit back and take a deep breath once in a while, and make sure to get some sleep— just not in a book.

Griffith always on the go for UMass

By Jamie Bearse
Collegian Staff

Jessica Griffith, a junior co-captain on the University of Massachusetts women's swimming team, is always on the go.

Griffith sits in a small cramped room in the basement of Bartlett Hall every Tuesday sorting psychology papers while tapping her foot and twisting her necklace around two of her fingers.

When less Griffith is not leading the Minutewomen in points, taking a bike ride or running, she is an honors student and a teacher's assistant in the psychology department working towards fulfilling her double major in psychology and sociology.

Griffith blames her high-strung life at UMass on that "competitive edge left over from prep school."

"I'm constantly on the go," Griffith said. "I can't sit still. I'm always fidgety."

It seems as though she has not sat down since junior year at Hampton Roads High School in Newport News, VA. when she was the captain of the track team and began a swim team with her two younger sisters, Adrianne and Carolyn.

Griffith won Virginia State Championships in the 330 yard hurdles and the high jump before "burning out" and shifting her concentration on swimming.

"I just got burnt out from running track," Griffith said. "My body can still take swimming, so I started a high school swim team and a year-round swim club called the Coast Guard Blue Dolphins."

Griffith left her sisters behind to lead their teams in swimming as she came to UMass.

Griffith came to UMass in the fall of 1992, as a freshman recruit, to get away from the "highly competitive atmosphere of southern swimming."

According to Griffith, "southern swimming" emphasizes "too much

> "I'm constantly on the go. I can't sit still. I'm always fidgety."

on getting people on U.S. teams, and they may end up "burning out" before getting to college.

"I do it [swimming] for me, not to kill myself," Griffith said. "Besides, I've loved the laid back approach of Bob [UMass Coach Bob Newcomb]."

Jessica Griffith is not without obstacles in her life.

Griffith suffered an on-going rotator cuff injury in her right shoulder during her freshman and sophomore seasons. A rotator cuff injury happens when the muscles around the shoulder get micro-tears.

"It's not bad now, it does something to your mental image when you have to get out of the pool when everyone else is still swimming," Griffith said. "Now, if it hurts, I just give myself a psychological block so it doesn't hurt."

She continues to improve.

Last week in the New England Championship Meet, Griffith lead the Minutewomen to fourth place tallying 76 points by placing second in the 100 yard breast stroke, third in the 200 yard breast stroke, sixth in the 50 yard freestyle and swam the third leg in the Minutewomen's victorys in the 800 freestyle.

The Minutewomen set a school record with their win in the relay.

Newcomb uses every adjective to describe Griffith.

"She's a solid swimmer," Newcomb said. "She's crisp in the water and is maturing into a terrific swimmer."

Despite their 1–2 mark, Griffith is optimistic about the Minutewomen's young season.

"Things are going great. I had my doubts, but now everyone's got their heads on their shoulders, even the freshmen are maturing very quickly," Griffith said.

Jessica Griffith will continue to breast stroke into the spot light this Saturday when the Minutewomen swim against the Lady Knights at Totman Pool.

"They [Rutgers] have a great breast stroker that I'm interested in seeing how I do against," Griffith said. "We've never had a duel meet against us, but we've got the home pool advantage."

UMass was edged by Rutgers for the No. 4 ranking in the Atlantic 10 Championships to end the season last February. The Minutewomen and Griffith will be looking for revenge.

Strawberry charged with income tax evasion

By Larry Neumeister
Associated Press

NEW YORK – Darryl Strawberry, an All-Star shadowed by repeated trouble off the field, was charged Thursday with tax evasion for allegedly hiding $500,000 made at baseball-card shows and other events.

The 32-year-old outfielder was accused of conspiring with his agent, Eric Goldschmidt, to hide income from the Internal Revenue Service by demanding he be paid in cash for promotional events held from 1986 to 1990.

An indictment handed up by a federal grand jury in White Plains and distributed by the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan alleged the San Francisco Giants player collected thousands of dollars in cash.

If convicted, Strawberry and Goldschmidt both face a maximum penalty of five years in prison on one count of conspiracy and two counts of income tax evasion. They also would face possible fines of $250,000 or twice the gross loss to the government, whichever is greater.

At a Feb. 11, 1989, autograph signing in Newburgh, he was paid about $12,000 in cash, prosecutors said. Other promotional events cited by prosecutors were in Manhattan, Middletown, Poughkeepsie and Mount Kisco.

Strawberry of Rancho Mirage, Calif., and Goldschmidt, 35, of San Diego, concealed the existence of a Queens bank account from an accountant so a substantial part of Strawberry's promotional income would not appear on 1989 and 1990 tax returns, according to the indictment.

John Tigue Jr., a lawyer for Strawberry, said the player will plead innocent at his arraignment, scheduled for Wednesday.

"He denies the charges. He hopes to have a trial schedule which will permit him to participate fully in the 1995 season, if there is one," Tigue said.

Calls to Goldschmidt at his home and office were not immediately returned.

Strawberry, an eight-time All Star, helped the New York Mets win the World Series in 1986. However, his career has been beset by substance abuse and family troubles.

Senior defender Kocher named All–American

Senior defender Heidi Kocher of the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team has been named to the Division I All–America Team, one of only two players from the Northeast Region to be selected to the All–America First Team.

Kocher, a co-captain, started all 22 games this year and was the team's fourth leading scorer with 13 points on two goals and a team-high nine assists. She was also named to the All–Atlantic 10 Conference first team along with the Atlantic 10 All–Academic team for the second consecutive season. She started every game in her four year career scoring 27 points.

The Minutewomen finished the season with a 16–6 overall record. They won the A–10 regular season and tournament titles for the second straight year. They advanced to the second round of the NCAAs before falling to Hartford.
